In the Arctic, mining and oil drilling harm animals and landscapes. While Antarctica is protected from industry, even visiting tourists can hurt its environment. Industrial waste Discarded oil drums rust away very slowly in the cold, dry Arctic air. On the Melville Peninsula in northern Canada, garbage like this spoils the landscape and threatens wildlife. Oil spill Sometimes oil pipes crack, or tankersâ€™ huge ships that carry oilâ€™ break up in the sea. When this happens, thick black sludge leaks out and poisons the landscape. This oil-polluted lake is in western Siberia. Ozone hole Ozone depletion Very low ozone level Wrapped around the Earth is a layer of invisible gas called ozone, which helps block damaging rays from the Sun. Pollution has made holes in the ozone layer at both poles. Low ozone level Average ozone level Antarctica viewed from space Warming up Burning fossil fuels create a kind of pollution that makes the Earth warmer. When the poles warm up, the ice, like this Arctic slab, starts to melt. Tourists are asked not to leave waste behind, or interfere with wildlife in any way. Polar sightseeing Travel companies arrange special cruises for people who want to visit Antarctica. Here, tourists explore Paradise Harbor from inflatable rubber rafts. Baloks are pulled by reindeer. Ground squirrels have burrows. Many bears and squirrels hibernate. The Inuit are native to the Arctic. Ice crystals stick together to form snowflakes before they fall. Some walrus have long tusks.
