All day, Tieran and I sat around inside our Airbnb- a luxury we viewed as a treat on our journey. We cooked, we cleaned, we packed, we did laundry, we ate. We even paid a visit to Rema , our grocery store of choice in Norway. Even the five-minute walk there was miserable. We entered the store with water trailing behind us, the damp rubber of our sneakers squeaking as we shopped. Two cans of mixed fruit and a jar of Nugatti later, we accepted our fate: Even on what we considered nice days, a cold drizzle would find us at some point, reminding us that we were indeed in the Arctic Circle. Eventually, we decided to go. We justified what was probably an unwise decision by planning to only travel about 30km; a much shorter distance than usual. We packed up and left, reluctantly locking the door to our Airbnb paradise. The first few miles were okay, as they usually are. However, on a bad day, those feelings of hope usually fade as the cold and the rain start to penetrate your layers of clothing, and a nasty headwind slashes at your face. Two and a half hours later, we surrendered to the weather. We stopped a few kilometres short of the town we aimed to reach, completely defeated. The rain had soaked through our waterproof gloves, pants or trousers for our English readers , hiking boots, and coats. Neither of us had any feeling in our hands or feet. When we finally crawled inside, reality hit us: How hard can biking be? Sometimes, all it takes to hit your wall is one thing. It can be cold and windy- fine. Maybe even a little hilly- okay. Riding up hills, you grit your teeth and fight back tears. You curse the wind when it tries to slow you down. Everything anyone or anything says or does angers you. The catch is, you still have to keep going. There might not be a shop or a place to camp when you hit your wall. Maybe your partner wants to keep going. In real life, giving up is usually an option, despite what people say. But you can still do it. You need water, and maybe even a toilet. You still hit your wall, but you have to keep going. The worst moments are waking up in a tent, realizing you have no real food left for breakfast. The next shop is 20km away, or maybe even On our first morning camping, Tieran and I ate cold pasta and pesto. Another morning, we ate cold quinoa mixed with lentils. You sit there, spooning cold leftovers into your mouth, still wearing your damp thermals from the day before. I think about how I could be back home in the warm summer sunshine in Chicago, eating pancakes on a Saturday morning with my family. This morning, however, I write this perched on an oversized, plush chair. I watch ferries and cruise ships come and go while sipping a cup of chai tea. The bathroom has heated floors. I remember the cold pasta, and rain, and sleeping on the dirty floors of ferry waiting rooms, and although the memories are slightly raw and painful, I begin to understand how these experiences have shaped me. My kitchen at home is always stocked with food, and I make myself run every single day, just to stay healthy and offset inactivity. Despite what I said the first day of cycling countless times: As miserable and exhausted as you are, your body can still push further. Steep as the mountain may be, you will eventually make it to the top. Turns out, an adventure that manages to turn from brash to boujee and back again in a matter of days is what I needed to learn about myself- even if it means a little bit of cold pasta. Liberals care about inclusiveness and understanding and making sure that even those seemingly incapable of speech or interest in speaking e. Conservatism goes wrong when it lets people get hurt out of fear that those people might weaken the elite group if allowed into it. Liberalism goes wrong when it lets compassion for other people weaken the country without some positive trade-off i. Both are scared because they feel the object of their fear will make selfish choices rather than choices that are in the best interest of the country. What did I miss? For the record, I think this is a really comprehensive description. But I think that conservatives value hard-work and anyone willing to do that from either side politically, economically, socially, etc. Try to help people to help themselves, not give them everything they need. Whereas the universe is really existential and absolute. Resources can be anything from wealth or cultural clout and both produce behavioral constraints. I think these things are complicated by the size of current society and other factors. Our society is extremely massive and the mechanism by which collective efforts intentional or not operate are obscured from view. The tricky part is- some people were killing or quarantining themselves or others basically writing themselves and others out of the bigger story in order to prevent the contaminant from spreading. So you had people without free will harming themselves and indirectly harming others by being unable to stop themselves from spreading that self-harm impulse to more people, and you had people who were smart enough to notice that before falling victim to it themselves but whose only solution so far was to consciously remove themselves and others from society either by isolation or by death. The only reason not to think so is the contaminant only made people hurt themselves and spread itself, and these people were hurting themselves and were directly hurting others though in the name of protecting the larger populace from the contaminant. In the case of isolation rather than death , it still felt wrong because it was abandoning those already infected and those elsewhere who could get infected. It was terrifying and depressing regardless. Thanks for being such a crazy bastard, sleeping brain. In the past, some civilians who have done so have been arrested, or told to stop, for obstructing justice. Otherwise, I do not understand how greater transparency is obstructive. I suppose it could also be an issue for the privacy of the people interacting with the police, particularly if they are minors.

The Argentina facilitated hundreds if not a huge number of them: Even those who are accused of the most heinous crimes, such as Ante Pavelic, of which the Croatian regime murdered hundreds of thousands of Serbs, Jews, and Gypsies, Dr. Josef Mengele whose cruel experiences are the stuff of nightmares and Adolf Eichmann architect Adolf Hitler Holocaust were welcomed with open arms. We can ask the question: The answers may surprise you. During the second world war, Argentina clearly favored the axis due to close cultural ties to the Germany, Spain, and Italy. This is not surprising because most Argentines were of Spanish, Italian or German origin. The Nazi Germany has fed this sympathy, promising significant trade concessions after the war. The Argentina was brimming with Nazi spies, Argentine officers and representatives have held critical positions in the Europe pivot. The second world war ended one day in and suddenly everyone realized how horrible the Nazis had been. Even after that, the Germany was defeated, there was a lot of powerful men in Europe who had favored the Nazi cause and continued to do so. Spain was still run by the fascist Francisco Franco and was named a member of the alliance of the axis; many Nazis would find refuge course, if temporary, it. Switzerland had remained neutral during the war, but many important leaders were openly in their support of the Germany: Switzerland bankers, out of greed or sympathy, have helped the former Nazis moving money through laundering. The Catholic Church has been extremely useful: There was a financial incentive for the Argentina to accept these men. Rich Germans and Argentine businessmen of German origin were willing to pay the way to escape from the Nazis. Nazi leaders plunder untold millions of Jews they murdered and some of that money accompanies them to the Argentina. Some of the most intelligent Nazi officers and employees saw the writing on the wall early in and began to distort away gold, silver, value objects, paintings, etc. Ante Pavelic and his cabal of close advisers were in possession of several chests full of gold, jewelry and art they stole their Serb and Jewish victims: They have even paid off British officers to let them through the Allied lines. In , the allies were mopping up the last vestiges of the axis, it is clear that the next major conflict would occur between the capitalist USA and the Communist Soviet Union. Nazi war criminals and collaborators have butchers, but there is no doubt that they were fiercely anti-communists. At last, these Nazis had a small enduring effect on Argentina. Argentina was by all account not the only place in South America that acknowledged Nazis and teammates: The greater part of the Nazis who went to Argentina experienced their lives discreetly, dreading repercussions in the event that they were excessively vocal or noticeable. After some time, the nearness of such a large number of World War Two war crooks progressed toward becoming something of a shame for Argentina.
