Even though my current pad is self-inflating, I decided I could handle a bit of huffing-and-puffing. The Flash pad comes with its own lime green and black stuff sack that closes tight via a pull cord closure secured by a push-lock. The stuff sack appears to be of quality construction with no visible flaws and fits closely to the Flash pad - so closely, I was very wary about my ability to get the pad back in once I had it out! When my Flash pad arrived, I was very excited by its light weight and small size; however, the measured size of the Flash in its stuff sack is not anywhere near as small as the listed 4 x 5 in. My measurement was 4 x 9 in. Close the valve once the pad is fully inflated. On a smooth surface cleared of sharp sticks or stones, roll or fold pad toward valve until all air is forced out. To clean, REI recommends washing the pad by using a mild detergent or degreaser with a soft brush on a fully inflated pad after having closed the valve. After washing, rinse and let the pad air dry. Should I have a senior moment and have to repair my pad, according to the care tag, I can purchase a repair kit from REI online or by phone. After loosening and removing the compression strap, I noted the pad was folded in thirds length-wise before it was rolled up. I was hoping I would be able to duplicate the folds and the tight roll so as to be able to put the Flash back in its stuff sack when the pad was not in use. I took a deep, deep breath and blew 29 times over the course of 1 minute to totally inflate the pad. The big bad wolf has nothing on me! Not bad at all! Never mind I was light-headed and ready to lie down on that pad right then and there - which I did. But I have to finish this report first! Compressed Flash Pad Inflate Valve Deflating the Flash was simply a matter of pulling out the deflate valve at the foot of the pad and by the time I composed and typed the above paragraph 1 minute or so, all the air had escaped. I folded the pad in thirds length-wise and starting from the top of the pad, rolled it carefully and tightly to the end. On the very first try, I was able to put the Flash pad back into its stuff sack almost as neatly as it was when it arrived. I did have to take it out, however, because I had forgotten to fasten the compression strap around it before I did so. I suspect I will not bother with the compression strap once I am using the Flash pad in the field. Once less thing to lose. There is something very exciting about tramping and sleeping outdoors in the colorful landscape and the crisp cooling air of a Colorado Fall. While it is still very hot here at the moment, I know the season change is right over that next mountain ridge and I am really anxious to get out on the trail and try out the REI Flash Insulated Air Sleeping Pad. I was looking for a smaller, lighter pad and this one sure is that! I love the compactness of the pad and am optimistic this will pack nicely in my backpack. On first try-out, the Flash has firmness and appears to be very comfortable. Cloudy with early afternoon heavy rain downpour Nighttime Temperature Low: But a close second when I consider which pad to take on a backpacking trip, is how much of the valuable real estate of my pack does the pad gobble up? So, the compactness of the Flash pad was very much appreciated when I packed it into my backpack for the first time. I was able to squeeze in a micro fleece sleeping bag liner with no additional loss of space. Another consideration is how easy is the pad to inflate? The Flash pad does require some actual work, well, effort. OK, enough with the French, eh? Voila - see there; Quelle Horreurs - what horrors. End of French lesson. On my first trip out, challenged by my daughter-in-law who was able to blow the Flash up in only 12 breaths, I practiced few deep breaths and then gave it a go. Julia may be able to beat me at sleeping pad inflation - Hey! Now, onto the sleeping experiences using the Flash sleeping pad. Oh, I have to explain why? Well, all-righty then, here goes! First off, the loft of the Flash is very note-worthy - a full 2. That means my sleeping bag has a very nice air space between it and the cold hard ground. This will be even more meaningful as I get into the winter months and that cold hard ground gets even colder. This amount of cushioning is very, very comfortable. Much more so than any other sleeping pad I have ever used! Having a non-slippery surface material has proven to be a boon as well. The surface material of the Flash pad also is quieter. As with my initial try-out, the Flash pad deflates quickly. It quite neatly tucks away into its stuff sack every time with no fuss. I have been storing the Flash deflated but flat between trips these past two months and it looks like new still. Both treks were local in the Wet Mountains south of Canon City and both were quick overnights - no lingering in the beautiful fall colors for me this year. The first overnight was near Bigelow Divide, elevation ft m and the second at Hardscrabble Pass, elevation ft m. The Wet Mountains are noticeably different from other sections of the Rocky Mountains range area in that they are less "harsh", more rounded with broad valleys. They are named "Wet" for a reason and get more snow and rain than the Arkansas River Valley which lies at their base. On both backpacks, the weather was stellar - bluebird skies, mild temperatures, and low humidity. Nighttime temperatures were in the mid 40s F 7 C in the early evening hours and became progressively colder into the wee hours just before dawn, down to 35 F 1. Stuffing it back into its pack sack can be accomplished perfectly if I take my time and fold it properly. Inflate quickly and easily with minimal effort. Small pack size for optimal backpack space. Very comfortable to sleep on in winter conditions. This is by far the best sleeping pad I have ever used and will definitely be replacing my former favorite sleeping pad. I heartily recommend the Flash especially for colder weather conditions. This concludes my test report for the REI Flash Insulated sleeping pad, but it is certainly just the start of a long, happy relationship between me and my Flash!
