ClickÃ© almost everything one can think of. When Sally went off to college, she took everything but the kitchen sink. John orders everything but the kitchen sink when he goes out to dinner, especially if someone else is paying for it.

Get in Touch The Modern Kitchen: Everything and the Kitchen Sink The traditional kitchen: Oven, sink and fridge. We have compiled just some of the most popular and useful newer kitchen add-ons, features and special areas that you might want to include in your new kitchen design. Double Ovens Double ovens are very useful for large families or people who have parties. They come in either wall stacked or side by side format and as you may have guessed, double your oven space. They also allow you to cook things that require different temperatures at the same time. Pot Storage Many large open kitchens have the space for a taste of whimsy by including a hanging pot rack. For most others, especially active family kitchens, being able to hide the pots away, but not need to struggle each time you need one is key. Cupboard and drawer insertions have made this possible, with pull out organized shelves for hard to reach corner cupboards, and well defined deep drawers with organizers for pots and other miscellaneous items. Coffee Bar Coffee lovers will rejoice over this addition during your home renovation. They can be extravagant to the point it looks like Starbucks in your home or they can be a little nook off to the side. In either case the coffee bar you design can include an espresso or specialty coffee machine, mugs, assorted add-ins and everything else you may need in your coffee. Wine Fridge If you like to collect wine, you may want to look into getting some inlaid storage in your kitchen. Wine fridges these days are designed to fit perfectly in your cabinet space, or the wall, depending on the size of your collection! There are many options to choose from and you will want to consult with your kitchen designer as to which ones fit the best in your new kitchen. Or maybe you have dinner guests that are constantly late. Warming drawers can be cost effective additions to kitchens with one oven where you find it hard to time baked dishes and need to keep them warm. These pet areas utilize nooks and crannies to create cute little spots for your pet to eat and, more importantly, stay out of the way. It also helps with the common issue of pet food mess, as these areas are usually built in and any mess is easier to wipe up. Bar Sink Sometimes referred to as prep sinks because, you guessed it, they are often used for food prep or thawing. These sinks are smaller than your average sink and hence their installation is pretty straightforward. These sinks also make prep easier and cleanup more convenient. They come in both top mount and under mount style and are compatible with most countertops. Check out our home remodeling ideas area to see more basement bar sinks. Home Office Nook For workaholics this will extend the ability to do work, check emails and news. These can take any form from an inset desk to simply a wall mounted TV or computer screen and a place for a laptop. Your New Modern Kitchen Kitchen design has advanced a long way in the last few years and with that comes many great possibilities in your new kitchen renovation. This is obviously not an exhaustive list and there are many more modern kitchen ideas that would be great to include in your new kitchen design. In order to get the maximum benefits from your new kitchen you should look at your needs, all of your options and talk to a kitchen designer, as they will know about all of these great modern kitchen additions.

Chapter 2 : Kitchen Sink Included - TV Tropes

The traditional kitchen: Oven, sink and fridge. Over the years' typical kitchens have grown to include microwaves, toaster ovens, dishwashers and many more cooking tools.

All ages and venues. This is played with one duo up against another duo. Each duo works together. You can either run this simply with continual volunteers, or "like in a classroom situation" divide the group into two teams and keep alternating the playing duos. The more ridiculous, the better- as this is "merrymaking" Purim-style, right? In each round of play, each duo is given a card with a concept, character or vocabulary word on it that must be depicted or acted out, which the group has to guess. You can offer mitzvot of Purim as a theme. Or the idea of trying to get as many Hebrew vocabulary words as possible stuffed into a whacky act or song. If you play with the noisemaker aspect on top of the goal of creating a Purim theme song, then creating the wackiest jug-band out of the handy junk you have been collecting can be a nice addition. Just having to repeat this long name constantly as a rule instead of being allowed to simply say "race" tends to send people into giggling Tongue-Tripping Land. Use this name as a cheerleading start-off chant before the race. Moreover, if this is a school or shul Carnival Happening, build your race event up in advance with kid-produced posters running around. You can add to the suspense with all sorts of teaser lines like: Really - go bananas. Any age, any venue, as long as you have a minimum of preferably eight people total in the race and up to about Or in other words, at least four people per team, teams total. Each team needs to be supplied with a something to carry clothes etc. This could be a largish knapsack, rucksack, little suitcase on wheels or pillowcase. Just as long as all teams have the same thing so as to be competitively fair. Clothing is prepared and ready in each bag for each team. It is advisable that the clothing be at least somewhat larger than most of the potential people involved in this enterprise ;-! Use oversized items that are easy to get on and off quickly When you prepare this, you might try going for a few items say total of clothing and accessories. If a shirt is the kind you put on by pulling it over the head e. An "outfit" might include: Name the teams - use vocabulary words for this purpose. In which case, you would say, for example: Here is what you will quickly explain and demonstrate: Each person in turn in a team will - Run to the designated endpoint for their team with the bag of stuff. Stop there, put on all the stuff. Run back with the empty bag to their team. Take off all the stuff. The next teammate in line is packing the items up in the bag while the previous teammate is taking them off. The packer is also allowed to help his teammate "undress". Once the bag is completely re-packed, this next person takes off. The first teammate to have run will be the last packer-upper, and the winning team is the first to have that bag packed for the last time and everyone sitting down. Quickly demonstrate or describe acceptable "dressing" and where. If someone forgets and tries to do that, tell them you will use a noisemaker to get attention e. Did you remember the name after all that ;-? If you ever want to know how to turn a "regular" activity into something tailored for a certain need, or need alternative suggestions, do write us and we will try to help you with thoughts on modifications or other options do share yours too with us. Besides, the truth is that some of the best educational and daily-living ideas that started out in special needs communities often end up becoming mainstream for the wider community: However, this is a notably useful one for much younger kids, and some with special needs unless they have sensory integration issues involving noise, of course. It is a very good "outfit" for developing fine motor and oral motor skills. Nothing beats an "interactive" costume! You can get as simple or complicated as you like and have junk to attach. If you happen to save old clips from ratty clothing you threw out, like in the photo overall clips, suspender clips, bull-clips, etc , they are a real handy "extra" now. Instead, you can sew on very short loops of cloth or T-shirt material around the shirt. Include a loop on at least one wrist. Of course, only the smallest things go on a wrist. Now hunt up noisy things. Like a toddler noisemaker not too big or heavy. A squeaky toy or ball works- in the photo it has the heart sewn over it but a pocket works as well. Or you can cut out a pocket from a T-shirt rag, put the squeaky in and quick-baste to your top. It also had washers knotted on it- just enough length to dangle on the metal " you can use embroidery thread or strong dental floss. Use a whistle, a top of a flute with a shoelace running through a hole down to its opening. Anything that makes a bit of noise. Attach each item to one of your shirt loops with a bit of short shoelace, or strip of T-shirt T-shirt strips roll up nicely into cloth string - a cm. The idea being that you want to be able to remove an item if necessary or move them around after testing for comfort and usability. No strip should be longer than absolutely necessary to be certain that the child cannot become entangled, trapped, choked or otherwise endangered either on his own or when a friend "engages" his outfit. Do double-check to be sure of this. Further, he loved the costume and it continued to be used during the following year with much glee - to work on some deficient developmental skills fine motor, coordination, oral motor, vision. Super-Cool Clown Costume tachposet costume Suitability: Again, not for the overly-noise-sensitive. But if you have a shyer kid, or one with communication issues, this one invites others to come up to say hi and ask for a honk, or whatever you attach to the hat. But really, we advise the horn, or at least a flute attached firmly lengthwise no dangling , or a couple little bells attached in the "hair" or brim, etc. That the clothes be bright and colorful. Shiny fabric is especially good, if you happen to have. That the top and pants be pretty over-sized for the wearer. Either suspenders or two T-shirt strips around 6 or so cm. You can sew the strips on or use good, dependable safety pins on the inside of the pants. Another old about-to-throw-out T-shirt, or a few in various bright and contrasting colors, or one that has a few colors on it. The kind of shirt material you want to use has a weave that rolls up when you cut it, like tricot. The non-sew fast method works best with a small t-shirt, like toddler or small kid size. But we recommend sewing, since you could get away with a few quick easy basting stitches. The pants should be the type with a drawstring or an elastic waist- one where the elastic was not stitched in, but can be easily pulled out. Any baseball cap, or other hat if you like. On the inner side, make a small slit in the waistline to pull out the drawstring or elastic. This is where "junk" comes in ;- Anything light and a bit stiff will do the trick not metal or hanger! A bit of leftover light hose, plastic tubing, part of an old hoopâ€ In the case of the pictured costume, an old round plastic laundry bin was found in the trash. The rim was cut off, washed and threaded into the waistline of some worn-out shiny pajama pants. Kid suspenders attached and voila. The junk hunt was a nice outing on trash day with the child to find "something usable" and took all of 15 minutes to come across, by the way. If not we would have cannibalized something running around the house already, or stuffed a lot of stockings or thin cloth strips into the waistband with a chopstick or knitting needle until we filled it all up to stiffen it slightly more time-consuming, but workable. Use a T-shirt that is smaller, especially in the neck. In this case a more stretchy fabric may be better. Put it "on" around your neck not the arms. Pull it up over your head so the neck part is now on your forehead and shirt on your head. Make some marker lines where your ears are and where the fabric comes across the middle of the back of the head. When you take the T-shirt off you will cut hair strips up to that line. Just trim your strips like a haircut after that to a length of hair that suits you: Throw the hat on top. Better and best permanent versions: Baste the hair above onto the inner rim of your hat. Cut a bunch of T-shirt strips. Make each strip slightly more than double the length you want. If you sew with heavier or embroidery thread, thicker dental floss, or nylon fishing line, by the way, it will hold up like iron for ages. Get a bike horn for the coup de grace. Sew it on in two points to anchor it well to the hat- going over again and again about times at each of the points- and tight. Again, heavier thread, embroidery thread, or nylon fishing line are the best choices for this.

At least the uniform matches. In certain kinds of stories, you want characters to have weapons. They need weapons to fight, their choice of weapon may reflect their personality, and it makes them look cooler. In real history, the development of swords, in particular, meant that each kind of sword had different uses. Arming swords and katanas, for instance, were primarily used for unarmoured civilian combat or as sidearms on the battlefield, generally not as primary battlefield weapons. Cavalry sabres longer than the version used by infantry officers were used by mounted troops against infantry and cavalry. Rapiers and small swords became popular as both civilian self-defense and dueling weapons, and were rarely seen on the battlefield at all. Some swords, such as the estoc and various late medieval longswords had narrow points designed for exploiting gaps in plate armour and thereby defeating fully armoured opponents, who were generally immune to simple cuts with a blade. Firearms and armor co-existed for a while approximately three centuries, but eventually, firearms made metal armor obsolete with some exceptions until the first practical bulletproof vests were created in the early 20th century. In fiction, however, that goes right out the window. And of course, a Medieval European Fantasy might have the odd Katana show up in the hands of a really cool warrior. A kind of Anachronism Stew. Justified by Rule of Cool. Some may try to Hand Wave it by having the weapons be more representative of a culture or nation rather than personality type, despite the clear impracticality of such a thing. Not to be confused with Swiss Army Weapon, which includes everything but the kitchen sink. Used to great effect; the Red Shirt uses machine guns that can shoot the supernaturals, the two main characters use katanas and the titular Mons, and the other squad members use improbable weapons such as a gatling gun briefcase and a motorbike that engraves sacred runes on the street. Invoked by the Muhou Ryu members in Gamaran: While all the other ryuu schools of martial arts are focused around one type of weapon, the Muhou Ryu includes many types of different fighting styles, hence different types of weapons, ranging from katana to spears to rapiers and weird swords to western halberds. A notable example is given by the 47th Division: Their leader wields a huge spiked club, while the members wield lots of weapons including huge swords, hammers, polearms, and gauntlets. Libra Dohko in the Saint Seiya franchise: Considering that everyone literally grabbed weapons off the wall, and that they were fighting in the Matrix, it makes sense. And there might have been a hole in his defense - using every available type of attack made sense. Broadswords are also mentioned in passing, but not elaborated on. Where do we start? Everything from rapiers to tree-trunks, slings to ballistas, cutlasses to teeth-and-claws makes an appearance. And of course, the hero gets the blade of Martin the Warrior, a straight bladed double-edged sword in accordance with the usual rules. Everyone else gets whatever their species usually uses. Justified in The Baroque Cycle. A very wide range of weapons come into the hands of various characters throughout the story, but everyone has a very specific reason to be carrying that type of weapon. When weapons are used, their appropriateness to the situation is almost always examined in detail. No one can ever accuse Neal Stephenson of not showing his work. In The Lord of the Rings each member of the Fellowship has slightly different weapons; justified by the fact that they come from different cultures and backgrounds and have very different heights. The Elven dagger Sting, previously owned by Bilbo and used by Frodo and Sam, has a blade inspired by that of the ancient Greek xiphos. Inevitable in The Hunger Games, given the fact that the Capitol just spreads them around in the Arena and hopes for a sloppy death scenario to increase the "entertainment" value. Many worlds have lightly-armored characters wielding rapiers and scimitars alongside heavily armored guys with big whacking great swords and great axes. It was mostly used for certain spells or attacks that involve grabbing the target rather than striking it. This is also noticeable with canon characters in the various game worlds. Artemis Entreri fought, for a long time, with a sabre and dagger he eventually got a straight-bladed sword that was more heavily enchanted. In their defense, the oddness of these choices was noted. A lot of Drow are ambidextrous and Drizzt is supposed to be an epitome of this. Entreri was, through extensive training, just about on par with Drizzt, and at least he was wielding a light weapon in his off-hand. Certain modern era action games and cyberpunk games will feature a more modernized version of this, where anachronistic melee weapons, small personal defense firearms, and military hardware suited to bringing down a corrupt third world regime will all be given equal time and consideration on the weapons list. Slightly deconstructed by the fact that GURPS uses reasonably realistic stats for all weapons - thus, using a weapon wrongly or against the wrong opponent will make the fight harder for you. The character templates and loadouts often try to match a fighting style. Eon has everything from humungous two-handed swords, all the way down to thin little rapiers. When it comes to the players themselves, the unforgiving and detailed combat system keeps them in check, with light weapons being almost completely forsaken in place of spears! Video Games The Elder Scrolls The series includes katanas, wakizashi, tantos, and Samurai-style armor alongside early Medieval armor, claymores, longswords, sabres, etc. This is justified by the series lore, as what we would call the Asian weaponry "tantos, wakizashis, katanas, and dai-katanas" are from Akavir, a continent far to the east of Tamriel, and were brought over by the Tsaesci, one of the four known Akaviri races, when they invaded during the 1st Era. The Blades, based originally on the Akaviri Dragonguard, blend Akaviri and Tamriellic styles in their equipment. Their armor resembles Roman Lorica Segmentata, their helmets resemble the Japanese Kabuto, and their primary weapons are katanas. Later games in the series, starting with Oblivion and especially in Skyrim, phase this trope out. For example, it is very rare to see a katana or any Asian style armor outside of the Blades, and no other types of Asian weaponry appear at all. Warcraft, especially World of Warcraft, is pretty guilty of this. But there is no inherent difference between an axe and a sword, other than the fact that not all classes can use both. Most games in the Final Fantasy series basically select weaponry choices based on personality or an abstract battlefield role within their battle system, at best simplifying the attributes of a particular weapon style to fit. Taken to certain extremes in Final Fantasy VI and Final Fantasy VII, where in addition to the usual array of weapons, you have characters using cards, dice, umbrellas, boxing gloves, paint brushes, drills, and even megaphones to deal damage, and all of them, depending on the Strength stat, are just as effective as their more practical counterparts. Somewhat averted in Final Fantasy X, which generally takes into account the need for different kinds of weapons for different kinds of enemies, but in a pinch, anything will usually work, just not as well. They are fire and wind rings, large balded rings designed for melee and NOT meant to be thrown, their increased size is what makes the main difference. Another habit of the games is to name some weapons inaccurately, but using the name most people would call the weapon, such as calling seals made for magic focus a cursed deck, or the above mix up with the rings. Lampshaded somewhat where another character wields a ball and cup game. I thought if one sword had an attack of then two swords would have an attack of right? In Phantom Brave, anything you can pick up can be used as a weapon, from sunflowers to starfish to werewolves. And then fused with everything else to combine skills, so you can end up with a sword that slaps like a fish or a pumpkin that stabs like a spear. This was the point of Dead Rising. Wanna play some Samurai Shodown? Then get ready to watch the Lady of War use her rapier to parry a huge stone pillar. Or maybe a Cat Girl using a boomerang to block a polearm is more your flavour. The Soul Series features a number of characters from different cultures of the 16th Century, and all fighting with different historical weapons and even a few fictional ones. These games go back and forth on this one. This trope is subverted in the sense that most weapons have a bonus for attacking a certain type of unit or a certain weapon style in a weapon triangle. Unwritten Legends is a particularly egregious example, in that just about every pre-internal-primer cartridge weapon you can think of probably has at least one example in game. Origins, apart from the elvish curved blades most every sword or dagger is a medieval European straight blade, and if you are going to be fighting heavily armored foes you probably are going to be using a mace or warhammer, though the game uses rather oversized versions of the latter. All 75 potential recruits in Exit Fate have a unique weapon, often named, and while they usually fit a more specific trope than Improbable Weapon User, the tropes in question vary wildly. Then again, most of the really ridiculous weapons are used by characters who have a low attack power. Team Fortress 2 originally mostly used unique variations of Standard FPS Guns and this trope only applied to the melee weapons, which included things from knives to bottles to bats to bare fists. The unlockable items have since plunged headlong into this trope, with things like bows, crossbows, cans of soda, sandwiches, flags carried around with a bugle, shields, boots, tranquilizer guns, flare guns, remote controls, lasers scavenged from crashed alien delivery ships, and jars of piss. In Rune Factory 3 , various townsfolk who accompany you to battle will carry a cutlass, a katana, a double-headed battleaxe, twin shortswords, a two-handed broadsword and a war hammer, respectively. In Betrayal at Krondor , any sword-using party member can use any kind of sword imaginable, be it rapier, cutlass, broadsword, or something the programmers clearly made up. However, swords meant for thrusting will be more accurate and powerful when used to thrust rather than swing and vice versa. Anachronox has seven protagonists, each with their own category of weapons. Noir-esque gumshoe with futuristic guns? Sexy assassin with knives? And chances are the bow is the strongest of the three. There is some justification for this one, though. The various factions in-game have differing technological capabilities, leading them to specialize in different kinds of weapons. Meanwhile, the really outdated stuff is still in use because the Tenno and Orokin were worried the Sentients would be able to subvert anything more advanced during the Old War. Taken to some rather ridiculous levels like everything else in Sengoku Basara. Justified in that they get all their weaponry from the miscellanopod trees , which give them entirely random stuff. Meanwhile, the members of the evil cult that opposes them are able to use Reality Warper powers to spontaneously manifest any weapons or equipment they want. During the "Oceans Unmoving" arc, the Space Pirates use swords, throwing hatchets, flintlock guns, grenades, switchblades, and even laser weapons. Justified since the residents of Timeless Space are literally from different points in history, some coming from the present, others the far future, and others the distant past. Web Original Chaos Fighters are this as a whole, with modern and medieval weapons appearing simultaneously. It gets egregious when bronze coin daggers, scimitars and katana are added. This is not counting the double weapons and mix and match weapons. The lack of parity is at times remarked upon as well. Some of everything in this package. Fey now has a magical mithril scimitar. Bladedancer has a magical jian made of jade.

Every time someone refers to the expression "everything but the kitchen sink" in any way, shape or fashion, an actual, literal kitchen sink will inevitably appear. Sometimes, the saying is not even mentioned; showing a kitchen sink in a context where the saying could be used works as a Visual Pun by itself. This trope is almost always Played for Laughs , especially in cartoons. Kitchen sinks are not only bolted down, but connected to the plumbing. Nothing to do with a Fantasy Kitchen Sink or a Sci-Fi Kitchen Sink , unless you somehow manage to incorporate them into the mythology as well. And that would just be silly. Also unrelated to the underground comix publisher Kitchen Sink Press who probably rather wants to allude to "filth" than to this trope. The whole commercial had been a Hurricane of Puns. Comic Books A Disney Adventures comic featuring The Mighty Ducks used this line when a brainwashed hockey crowd was attacking the team. Advertised as including an unneeded Lobo poster. The Demon and Lobo were beating the tar out of each other with every single weapon imaginable, including said sink. In one big splash panel showing off their work, you can see Darkwing Sink. The competition escalates to the point where the Brutopian has to bid all the kitchen sinks of his country. One Scrooge McDuck story has him run into a convoy of prospectors, which he fails to sell anything to. As he comments that they seem to have everything but the kitchen sink, one of them points towards his mule During the disturbance between dimensions in JLA: Another Nail , a kitchen sink is seen floating. From the parody "Marvel What The The Return of the Jedi parody has an unseen crewman on a spacecraft pointing out that the battle around the Death Star has everything but the kitchen sink. The newspaper Comicbook Adaptation of Rugrats had Stu complaining about packing too much when they went on vacation. Cue Stu holding a kitchen sink in the last panel. The Series , his Crazy-Prepared nature is described as thus: He has everything in there except for the kitchen sink. In the My Little Pony: And yes she has been shipped with a kitchen sink. I think they have everything up there but the kitchen sink! No, they have that, too. We need that sink back. In Jojos Bizarre Adventure Abridged , Dio stops time and throws more and more knives at the frozen Jotaro until there are too many for him to block or avoid. Before starting time up again, he adds, "And for comedic effect In the Mickey Mouse adaption of The Prince and the Pauper , When The Prince, Donald Duck and Goofy are escaping from the dungeon, the weasel guards throw various assorted weapons at Goofy, one of them being a kitchen sink. Old Fred opens up a cupboard door and lots of unlikely objects fall out, including a kitchen sink. Top Cat and the Beverly Hills Cats: Humorously subverted, then played straight at one point. Top Cat and his gang are having a wild party and their neighbors respond by throwing a bunch of junk at them to get them to quiet. Fancy then remarks that the neighbors have thrown everything but the kitchen sink; the next object dropped is a grand piano. At the end of Aladdin , the newly-freed Genie starts packing for his trip around the world. One of the things to go in his suitcase: Revenge of the Sith was so complex one of the people on the team said they had put everything in it but the kitchen sink. They then proceeded to rectify that. Watch closely, specifically the shot where we fly by a CIS ship as it breaks apart and a piece of debris smashes into a nearby Republic ship. In Abbott and Costello: Guess what Costello does. Similarly, the climactic battle of Batman v Superman: Dawn of Justice occurs in a derelict house. Batman uses everything in sight to bash on Superman, including a kitchen sink. During the fight between Rhodey and Tony in Iron Man 2 , Rhodey actually uses the sink to beat Tony over the head with.
