My wife and I would like to use some kind of simple budget program on the computer. Can you give any suggestions or what you use? Thanks for your help. Mike and I use a paper budgeting system, listing all of our income and expenses. If you make things too complex, you will get frustrated with it and quit. Here is an example of one of our previous budgets. We rarely have to look at it, since we pretty much have it memorized. The budget just gives a guideline for spending. For our readers, we have created a simple version of our form that you can download and use. We have three versions available below. If you prefer to have the form perform the calculations and you have a program that can use Excel files, the Excel Budget form below will calculate your income and expenses and also project your budget surplus or shortfall. Budgeting is really not complex. In a nutshell, you list your income and your expenses and adjust everything until your expenses are less than your income. If you are very perfectionist, budgeting can really drive you crazy since it is not a precise science. Generally, you want to estimate your income and expenses in each area on the budget. If you have precise information, like a regular specific dollar amount for your paycheck or your mortgage, enter that amount. When you estimate budget items, always estimate high. It is always better to have too much money at the end of the month than not enough. Once you get some practice budgeting, you will be able to more precisely estimate your expenses. If you have trouble tracking small expenses, like purchases of convenience store soft drinks or bubble gum, try the envelope system. After you make your budget, make separate envelopes for each budget item. If you end up with extra money in any envelope at the end of the month, add it to your savings or use it for something special. Never use money from one envelope to fund things in another envelope. The envelope system can help you identify areas where you typically spend more than your budget.

May 20 30 Comments Do you and your spouse struggle with making a budget you can keep? These budget tips for married couples help you understand why you tend to spend the way you do and how to work together to make a family budget that works for you! The problem can be rooted in a variety of issues including being raised differently, being taught differently about money, issues of control or lack of control, varying amounts of self confidence, anger and so on. Here are some examples of just one of these issues – being raised differently and taught differently about money. He assumed they were having a rough time financially but she thought she was doing so well by saving money. She just started serving steak once in a while and the problem was solved. One family member of mine who had very little money growing up swore when she left home she was going to have lots of money and buy whatever she wanted. She became a shopaholic. I had no more money growing up than she did but I turned out completely different from her. She came from a very bad home life so her outlook was completely different. It was lack of love. When she got older she tried to fill her void with the wrong things, which constantly failed to satisfy her. In my family we had plenty of love and, even though we had little money, we had enough of what we really needed. When a person spends recklessly or becomes obsessive about money, it is a symptom of deeper problems that go beyond the money. It takes a lot of thought and talking things through in a loving manner to identify the real problem. Usually one spouse or the other is better at handling money and the bills but a couple should sit down together and go through bills and finances so they both understand their financial condition. Then they both can see, in writing, what money is coming in and where it is going out. This way no one feels like one spouse or the other has more control and it eliminates many unpleasant emotions. It also includes disagreements between spouses. I remember one night my husband and I had a really bad fight about money. He was out of work, we had no food left and I wanted him to sell some of our antique furniture to get some money. It was one of the rare times we went to bed mad. I lay for hours fuming, clinging to my side of the bed you how we do, ladies and praying God would show my husband that we needed to sell our stuff. Did I deserve that! I asked forgiveness and changed my prayers really fast. No one can really change another person. You can only change yourself so your battle is learning to relax and understand that fact and learning to work with your spouse. Here are some things to talk about and to ask each other. Before I share them, you need to know that if your spouse is the kind of person that refuses to talk, listen or be willing to work with you to improve your relationship, you have more serious problems than how to spend your money. If that is the case, you really need to get help for your marriage in general. Work on the finances and bills together. You can agree that one of you will pay bills or balance the checkbook but regardless who handles the details, both of you need to look at what is going on together. Take time to do this. The important thing is that you are both in the loop. Before you do anything, sit down and air out feelings and issues. Choose a time when stomachs are full. Men seem so much more mellow when they have just eaten a good home cooked meal and have full tummies. Choose a time when everyone is relaxed and rested and you will not have many interruptions. Here are some things to ask each other and to consider together. Get some paper and pencils. It may be easier for some people to write down the answers. Couples who are planning to get married need to to ask each other these questions before they get married to reduce friction in the marriage. There are no right or wrong answers. These are just questions to help you learn to understand and to get an idea why the other person does things and acts the way they do. What is your family history? What are some things you remember your family taught and believed about money growing up that has stuck in your mind and that you remember? Did your family have savings? Was mom or dad a spender? Did mom shop and hide things from your dad or visa versa? Was money used in place of love and being there for the family? Was money not considered that important compared to relationships? What are your money fears? Did your parents not ever allow you to have anything because they were afraid of spoiling you, not having enough or were just plain tight and selfish with their money and you are afraid you might be like them, so you spend? What did your family spend their money on? Did you feel rich or poor when you were growing up? What fun things did you spend money on? Did your family buy a boat so they could spend time on the lake camping or did they like nice hotels in a city where they could go sightseeing? Did they like eating out all the time or did they spend their money on a new kitchen so they could all cook together? What do you personally like to spend money on? Define Your Values What things are important to you? Insurance, new car, nice house, tithing, charity, paying off debt. Set Goals and Budgets Does one of you think it is important to have a high paying job, working long hours and making good money where the other thinks living in the country with a little money and spending time together is most important? Now you need to take all your information and do a lot of compromising. Try to come up with a plan that will work for both of you. Look at your options and be willing to give and take. The main thing is to be loving and to open mindedly talk and talk some more with each other. Instead of demanding your rights and wants, put the other person first. It is amazing what can happen in all areas of marriage if both parties are always trying to fulfill their spouses needs and wants. You are a team and you should always work together going in the same direction, trying to do what is best and what helps the whole team the most rather than each person focusing only on his own wants. If you can get to that point, it will really strengthen your marriage. If you often wonder where all of your money goes or if you need a more frugal mindset, check out Dig out Of Debt and learn more about how to keep more of your money.
