Providing an excellent insight on the literary culture of the African people in more recent years. The stories themselves reflected in to the past as well. We see excellent reflections and allegories to the colonial and sociopolitical situations in the African continent. Up until more recent decades Africa was under direct influence of colonization by several European nations, the initial influence This collection of stories was chosen by instructor for world literature II, it was a great choice. However these lines effect the people in and around them one a government or paramilitary groups argues and fights over control which, revolutionary type action as such that, many coups. Then you have various European settlers and visitors, often entrepreneurs from Europe and South Africa in various regions, real estate, coal diamond, gold mining, farming, etc. These men frequented the many bars, clubs and red light districts throughout Africa. Many young women of the local people became parts of this, sometimes looking for glamour, attention, and money. We see this reflected in the many stories, in quite a variety of ways from a good variety of perspectives, from various countries; Botswana, Zimbabwe, Ghana, Kenya, South Africa, Egypt and more. In "Gentleman of the Jungle" we catch on to some thoughts and allegories regarding the colonization of African countries and how they were viewed. In the story we see animals in place of the European countries, the main character and his huts as the people and places of Africa, the animals try to force themselves in to his life and to use him and his resources, and before long it is ruined for him, he moves on creates a new hut but then it is over used by the animals, possibly referring to how the Europeans caused downfall and conflict throughout much of Africa when trying to over use it. Ultimately he builds one big enough for all of them and then burns it down on them, this is possibly referencing all of the revolutionary groups and coups that started one European colonizers got complacent in Africa. We see that in many stories they are allegories, fables, with a underlying story or moral, to convey a message a feeling. This is a common method used through many cultures to give a entertaining story while conveying a underlying meaning and moral. We see many excellent examples of this in the many stories of the book. From many perspectives at that, ones that are locals involved with various local factions, of various social classes, even some that come from the other side, children of colonialists Europeans or even a shared heritage between European and local, there is an excellent of all in this collection of stories, which gives a superb insight in to the literature of Africa which in turns gives insight in to its people, history, traditions, culture, society and beliefs through a great span of time. I found the stories of greatly varying quality. Some show maturity and grasp of the craft: This book - as well as the others I emotion above - goes a little way to showing what I mean. Mar 25, Karen A. Lloyd rated it liked it There were some excellent stories in this book but ultimately the inconsistency with the level of the different stories annoyed me. I was disappointed with how amateur some of the stories were. Albeit I appreciate the categorization by region, it was hard to focus when the themes in each region were so different. My favourite stories were from Achebe, Owoyele and Kenyatta.

The other short stories included Saba by Eritrean author Suleiman Addonia. According to the BBC site: Read by Abukar Osman. Produced by Emma Harding About the author: He has lived in London since His first novel, The Consequences of Love Vintage was published in The second in our series of contemporary stories from the Horn of Africa " Eritrea, Ethiopia and Somalia. Government by Magic Spell is the last in the series. It is important to keep in mind that the story was written some time between to The story begins with Halima at the age of 10, who we learn, has been possessed by a jinn, better known to Westerners as Genies. Halima is able to acquire a great deal of power and autonomy for a woman because of her family and clan being in awe of her jinn. Halima is able to refuse all the men who proposed marriage to her, including the Waadad. It had all started with one of their men who had become very powerful in the government. He had called his relatives and found big government jobs for them. And that had meant quick riches for everyone concerned. Nor had they been very scrupulous about getting what they wanted. Anything that stood in their way had to be pushed aside or eliminated. Based on my own experience, I can vouch that belief in jinn and their ability to possess people is quite commonplace among contemporary Muslims, and still strong amongst members of the Somali diaspora. But it is interesting to conjecture how the role of jinns in traditional Muslim African cultures could be seen as a throwback to earlier pre-Islamic beliefs in ancestor spirits.
