I must say though I liked one of the original slot sizing questions: Good suggestion, and running the numbers, I think this is actually more accurate. Check out the latest version. My co-DM wanted a more finely graduated system than strength in items that I think was too punishing in practice. Would you be up for sharing the word file if I kept your credit on the sheet? I actually never heard of a group treasure sheet before. Ezel - Friday, 19th June, , Definitely going to use it at my table. I get that people want a model more like real life, but I feel like heavy armour should be a boon and not a trade off. I like the simplicity of the slots though. For my game I might take the concept but reassign weights for various things. I want to get it to a point where characters can carry their standard equipment without worry, but struggle when they come across 2 chests overflowing with silver pieces. JValeur - Sunday, 21st June, , I use this sheet, but introduced a backpack system to it. But my characters do have to think about, how many weapons they bring, or what they pick up. Report Comment Ezel - Sunday, 21st June, , So that someone with a plate and 16 strength still has 8 slots free, like a wizard with 8 strength and no armor. No need for extreme realism, just enough to give the feeling of realism, with some calculated balance thrown in. So I can only say please: I might even use something like that myself. I think the current sheet is closer to the official encumbrance rules, though, which is what I was aiming for. Under those, a person with 16 Strength can carry up to 80 pounds before becoming encumbered. Plate takes up 65 of that, leaving 15 pounds free. Heavy armor is definitely a trade off. Quajek - Tuesday, 28th July, , Note on the sheet which I love , maybe add a toggle or something for Large creatures, or Goliaths, who have 2x the carrying capacity of a Medium creature with an equal Strength score, and for Small creatures, who have half. Small creatures actually have the same carrying capacity as Medium ones. A short session, but encumbrance came up. An armored character dumped his backpack labeled on the map so that they could avoid penalties. The barbarian carried the treasure. Lackhand - Wednesday, 25th November, ,
