Multimillion-dollar Ferraris, Jaguars, Astons, and a fine cup of tea The Goodwood Estate is nestled in the rolling hills of the south downs near the town of Chichester in West Sussex, England. For those who really want to go fast, Goodwood has its very own motor racing circuit. It was finally re-opened in after a sustained campaign to overcome local opposition by the current owner of Goodwood House, Charles Gordon-Lennox, Earl of March and Kinrara. I personally know the Goodwood circuit quite well. The drive is the central feature during the annual Festival of Speed which is currently in full swing this weekend. The FOS a hill climb for classic and modern racing cars and motor bikes has been held annually on the Goodwood Estate since During that time, it has become arguably one of the most important and prestigious motoring events in the world. In , I was still living in the UK where I was born and freelancing as a sports photographer for the Sunday newspapers. Lord March also invited a number of motoring enthusiasts he knew and asked them to bring their cars down for the day. It was swaying a little precariously in a cherry picker that raised me about 20 feet into the air so I could take a photograph of some of the rarest and most fabulous cars I had ever seen in my life. Being invited to that press day was like being given access to a private view of an art exhibition featuring some of the most beautiful and the loudest racing cars ever made. In front of the house, there is an enormous, vertiginous sculpture the design of which changes each year while the lawn and fields beyond are full to bursting with manufacturers stands, rides, hospitality units overflowing with guests, and numerous grandstands running alongside the drive to seat those members of the public who are happy to pay a little extra for the privilege. It is like a small town randomly decides to de-camp to deepest West Sussex and bring its entire population with it. There are a lot of people. Goodwood has a reputation for being rather lucky when it comes to avoiding the often inclement British summer weather people still arrive en masse, complete with their wellies if they remembered them, or plastic bags if they did not. The very active paddock area is engulfed by a sea of motoring enthusiasts of all ages who gather around the rare and exotic and occasionally downright bizarre cars and bikes like ants around a discarded jam sandwich. When moving their vehicles down through the paddock, drivers have to gently part the waves of people before them. Crowds of spectators watch giant screens displaying the action while sitting on the lawn in front of the house, or get up close and personal with the concours condition classic cars the Style et Luxe display outside the old stables “ where somewhat surprisingly, no one seems to mind small children pawing at near priceless vintage Rolls Royce or Hispano Suizas with ice cream covered fingers. Considering how huge it has become around , people attend each year , I wondered what he had expected the attendance to be like when he first planned that very first FOS back in ? We got about 25, people and we were, well, overrun. The number of entrants has as well. Every year, the entry list only seems to get longer and encompass an even more eclectic range of cars and motorcycles: The highlight of the party was standing up and getting a bowl of rice on the Saturday night. And now we seat people and have an absolutely massive show! Where does the FOS go from here? After all, the millennial generation seems to have a very different attitude to cars compared with those of mine. Interest in car ownership has decreased significantly while enthusiasm for car sharing and car hailing services are very much on the rise. Electric cars are gaining traction with the public and who knows, maybe hydrogen will be next? Even the wide world of motorsport seems to be suffering some kind of an existential crisis. Though there is some hope that Formula E and Robo Racing may offer a small respite, it is not going to be easy. There is clearly a need for the car manufacturers and racing organization bodies to have some strategic conversations about the future. It turns out that some of those conversations are happening at Goodwood. Lord March has actively cultivated a central role for the festival by bringing together the various interested parties to ask and answer the billion dollar questions about what exactly is coming next in the rapidly evolving world of cars and transportation. We have guys from Facebook, Uber, SpaceX, big designers here. The idea is to try to use the FOS as a brainstorming platform to talk about mobility: The fact that CEOs of major car manufacturing companies as well as titans of technology are seeing the FOS as increasingly important both in terms of future strategy and business opportunity will only strengthen the events continuing growth in terms of stature. These cars are simply not my cup of tea anymore. My interest in transportation is focused more upon the very real societal challenges that self-driving trucks and cars will bring rather than the exquisite lines of the latest sick Lambo. Lord March on the other hand, seems far better than I am at balancing his passion for classic marques and the latest hypercars with his fascination for what the future may hold. Project Nucleus and Future Labs both show his commitment to ensuring that the FOS remains relevant to both the car manufacturing industry and the paying public. But one of the things we may have more in common is a belief that it is possible to love a cheap car, even a bad car. It was absolutely dreadful, and far more dangerous than any motorbike, actually. But they are lovely things. I too have a love of cheap cars. I may have made my home in the US and become an American citizen, but I still love my quintessentially British Range Rover which has holes in the carpet, dents in the bodywork and no window in the back because the tailgate crumbled with rust and fell apart. The 25th Goodwood Festival of Speed runs through to the end of this weekend.
