She has bright red hair styled punk, and wears red-framed glasses, red Wilson basketball shoes, black leggings and jacket with a short dress. But her appearance is not all that is cool about her. She brought with her a book called, "The Incredible Storybook. When she reads from it, all the characters and scenery pop out and come to life. Before she begins, she warns us not to yell or do anything to change the story. So on to the story. We spy a line of explorers. Two men stop to have a discussion in the middle of the jungle when a Tyrannosaurus rex appears there behind the two men. I yell a warning to them, we all scatter, then Miss Smith disappears. There is a sense of things not finished at the end. There obviously has to be a sequel, so why not state: In other words, the illustrations are fabulous but quirky. As for the ending, I deducted one star. The artwork is incredible and the idea that stories inside books came come off the pages tickles my three-year-old. This one is very loosely based on The Lost World with some good dinosaur information. Perfectly understandable for kids from ages 2. My son has even learned the words vegetarian and herbivore, which was helpful when he offered a year-old a bite of his chicken and she said no she was a vegetarian. I reminded him about Stegosaurus and he immediately understood. As a librarian, I always introduce this book as the story of the person I most want to be. If I could open a book and make a story come into my library, I would never again have to worry about competing with the PE teacher. My 1st and 2nd graders liked the first Miss Smith book, but they love this one--mainly because now we can write our own sequel to the book. That flying dinosaur was recently seen at our school and we are tracking it to get an interview: Miss Smith is back, reading even more amazing stories to her class, and once again proving that reading really is magic. Miss Smith is one of a kind. Everyone is having a marvelous adventure The class runs for cover. But what has happened to Miss Smith? They think the story is about me. Very well told stories that hold their interest, and the illustrations are excellent. This time round, Miss Smith and her class of second graders read about The Lost World and are virtually transported into a world inhabited by intrepid explorers and dinosaurs of all shapes and sizes, including the fearsome T. When Miss Smith disappears while on a trail, the kids do all they can to track her down. Will they rescue Miss Smith before it is too late? The story itself is full of imagination and adventure, yet the illustrations deserve praise for bringing the story vividly alive in a burst of color.
