It is engraved with the number The trunk is architectural: Then it disappears through limbs and needles, rising another 10 stories into blue sky. Out of my pack I pull a spreadsheet that Howard Stoner, a retired mathematics professor from Troy, e-mailed to me. Over the past 10 years he has measured and tagged every big white pine in this grove. He discovered that this is the tallest tree on record in New York State. Five of them are taller than the Statue of Liberty, base to torch. Collectively they are known as the Grove sometimes called the Elders Grove. Kudish has known this grove since he came to teach at the college in the s. He is now on a quest to map what remains of all primeval forest in the Adirondacks and Catskills. Kudish calculated the age of the elders by counting the rings of large, downed trees in the area. The Grove trees are among the oldest in the East. The woods on every side of the acre grove have been cut at some point. So why do the elders get to die of old age? Stoner guesses that early loggers were unsure of property lines and may have decided to err on the side of caution, leaving a buffer zone. Today the stand is part of the Forest Preserve a disjointed fragment of the Saranac Lakes Wild Forest , where logging is prohibited. The nearby Adirondacks led him into a subculture of citizen scientists who study charismatic megaf flora. I wanted to learn this stuff. It was very fascinating. So then I spent 10 years or so pretty seriously measuring trees, most every other weekend, year-round. Instead of hiking every weekend I was out measuring trees someplace. There are no trail markers, and the trip entails a short bushwhack, so carry a map and compass or GPS Latitude Just east of the hamlet of Easy Street where the speed limit changes from 40 to 55 , park by a gated logging road on the south side of Route Walk in on the logging road to a large clearing. Orient yourself and follow another logging road south out of the clearing. About a quarter mile from Route 86 you come to a power line. Turn left on the power line and walk up the hill about a thousand feet. Fifty yards before the utility pole at the top of the rise, turn south and bushwhack downhill into the woods another thousand or so feet. You have found the grove when you see large white pines marked on the north side with silver tags above eye level. Tree is the most easterly. The grove is part of the Saranac Lakes Wild Forest.

A key competency for any archivist starting out or moving up is the ability to negotiate a fair and equitable salary. Statistics show that accepting a smaller salary than you deserve can cost you thousands over the course of your career, so it is well worth investing the time to develop the skill of negotiating with a potential employer. The Association of College and Research Libraries ACRL recently published this research on the salary negotiation patterns between men and women in academic libraries. Beth Myers, Smith College If ever there was a reason to celebrate, a successful job search is at the top of the list. For most people there is a palpable relief that so much hard work is in the rearview mirror “mulling the posting and potential ramifications of getting a new job good, bad, and unknown , crafting and submitting the application, the waiting, the interview s , the reference calls, the waiting. But in other ways hard work still lies ahead and few other psychological roadblocks loom as large for so many people as the salary negotiation. The negotiation period places the job seeker and organization making the offer in a nebulous sociocultural-economic space loaded with assumptions, guess work, power dynamics, and awkwardness. Like an ABD distinction for PhDs, the salary negotiation period conveys the status of incomplete or perhaps uncertain success—a journey not yet finished. Not all jobs come with a period of negotiation for salary and benefits, let alone so-called perks. Some first offers are also final offers due to internal constraints that are rarely visible to the job candidate. Term positions, hourly positions, and entry-level salaries are often, but not always, fixed. Some organizations are more transparent in the process than others, but none that I know of completely reveal the boundaries or wiggle room or define exactly what is on offer. In the absence of specifics, most job candidates are forced to guess at the limitations of the offer: Where is the real ceiling and where is the real floor? All the while, a psychological ripple begins for the job candidate: How much do they like me? What if I ask for too much? The reverse of this can also be true. Hiring managers often function under institutional pressure to keep labor costs low. If too low, the best candidates may well and rightly be out of reach. There are steps a candidate can take to enter the negotiation period with confidence that, with some luck, will result in a quadam victoria “certain victory or, more likely, certain compromise. First and most important is knowing what your red line is. The red line is the package that you need in order to live the quality of life that you require. The red line is so-called because it is non-negotiable, solid, and inflexible. The red line exists so that you know well in advance what it will take to complete the negotiation and at what point you are willing to walk away regardless of how tempting the job might be. That includes school tuition discounts and family leave support not otherwise determined by the federal government. There are a bevy of tools out there to help you determine the economics of your job transition. One of the more oft-cited is the living wage calculator from MIT. There are other ways to do your research a bit closer to the profession. Some of these sources are dated now, but can be instructive: Initial Results and Analysis by Robin H. It is also important to gather as much unofficial information as possible. Tap your professional networks and friends and, by extension, their networks and friends. Although there is a general reluctance in U. Ask around “ public academic and government job salaries and grades are typically posted publicly; academic and corporate jobs are as often obscured. Sometimes the only way to get a sense of the salary is to ask friends or former employees at that institution. If quality of home life is a main motivator to change jobs, talk to people who live in the area. The more you know, the better prepared you will be. Once you have done the homework, determine your red line. Remember to consider the full package on offer, not just the pre-tax salary. Do some soul searching: How much do you really want the job? No job is perfect, no institution is perfect. Even self-employment has its drawbacks. What a new position offers is potential and hope. That hope can be for advancement. How does the job fit in the longer professional trajectory? That hope can be for a better work environment and culture. How do people get along at work? How does the institution support its workers? That hope can be for a better living environment.

Is it time to leave the city for the town or vice versa? Although it would be easier to reduce a prospective job to the salary, such an approach ignores the real impact and complexity of making a professional move. A few more suggestions to keep in mind prior to starting your salary negotiations: Know that everyone wants a positive outcome. While it is important and reasonable to have high expectations about the offer, be prepared to compromise. It is likely that your initial salary number will be high and the first offer low. This is a 5K, not a sprint. There are also practical concerns when negotiating salary. Typically negotiations will take place over the phone. You will likely be negotiating with the person who will be your supervisor, but it might be a representative from human resources or another person in the organization who is authorized to negotiate. Typically the first offer comes from the employer. Keep notes on the conversation to reflect on later. If you feel pressure or are uncertain, ask for a little time to think about the offer. Twenty-four hours is common, but you can ask for more time. If the offer is truly too low and below your red line, tell the employer and provide a counter offer. If you think the negotiation is not moving forward productively, you can ask to speak to someone in human resources although responses to that request will vary by institution. What kind of tech package do you need to be successful on the job? What support is guaranteed for professional development and training and professional association memberships on an annual basis? What support will the institution offer for a trailing partner or spouse? Is there a chance for a one-time signing bonus? Are funds for continuing education for advanced degrees and certifications available? Does the institution support paid leave for research and scholarship? Does the institution offer subsidized housing? No matter how high the stress or emotions involved, avoid ultimatums and framing your needs in absolutes. This is a poor negotiation tactic in any circumstance! Instead, frame your needs from a practical point of view. Throughout the negotiation, restate your commitment to the job, the specific ways in which hiring you will benefit the organization, and the unique skills and abilities you will bring—all of which translates to how you are worth the investment. Finally, no deal is final until you get the offer in writing from the institution, so hold off on making any public announcements or giving notice at your current position until that all-important letter arrives.
