History[ edit ] Stevenage lies near the line of the Roman road from Verulamium to Baldock. Some Romano-British remains were discovered during the building of the New Town, and a hoard of 2, silver Roman coins was discovered in during new house building in the Chells Manor area. The most substantial evidence of activity from Roman times is Six Hills , six tumuli by the side of the old Great North Road – presumably the burial places of a local family. A little to the east of the Roman sites the first Saxon camp was made in a clearing in the woods where the church, manor house and the first village were later built. Settlements also sprang up in Chells, Broadwater and Shephall though before the New Town Shephall was a separate parish and Broadwater was split between the parishes of Shephall and Knebworth. The settlement had moved down to the Great North Road and in it was granted a Royal Charter to hold a weekly market and annual fair still held in the High Street. The known list of priests or rectors is relatively complete from The remains of a medieval moated homestead in Whomerley Wood is an yard-square trench almost 5 feet wide in parts. It was probably the home of Ralph de Homle, and both Roman and later pottery has been found there. Around the Church was much improved, with decorative woodwork and the addition of a clerestory. The school, which has been since a mixed comprehensive school and is now an Academy as of , still exists on its original site at the north end of the High Street. It was intended to move the school to Great Ashby , but the Coalition government –<sup>15</sup> proposed scrapping the move owing to budget cuts. Many inns in the High Street served the stage coaches , 21 of which passed through Stevenage each day in In the Great Northern Railway was constructed, and the era of the stage coach had ended. Stevenage grew only slowly throughout the 19th century and a second church Holy Trinity was constructed at the south end of the High Street. In Dickens commented, "The village street was like most other village streets: The quietest little dwellings with the largest of window-shutters to shut up nothing as if it were the Mint or the Bank of England. He produced the legendary motorcycles, including the Black Shadow and Black Lightning, in the town until Stevenage New Town[ edit ] Play media Post-war animated film by the Central Office of Information about new towns and their planning, featuring a design similar to that of Stevenage The tiled mosaic on Stevenage Clock Tower, showing the intent of the Development Plan for housing, industry and leisure. In the radical town planner Dr Monica Felton became Chairman of the Stevenage Development Corporation but she was sacked within two years. There were a number of reasons for her dismissal by the government but a lack of hands-on town planning leadership and her opposition to the Korean War for which she was later awarded the Stalin Peace Prize sullied her reputation. In keeping with the sociological outlook of the day, the town was planned with six self-contained neighbourhoods. It closed in At least two other public houses have a direct relationship to local history. The second pub with a possible link to local history is the "Our Mutual Friend" in Broadwater. The name of the pub is the title of a novel by Charles Dickens. Next to be built and occupied were the neighbourhoods of Bedwell in , and then came Broadwater and Shephall , Chells in the s and later Pin Green and Symonds Green. Another new development to the north of the town is Great Ashby. As of [update] it was still under construction. Although revolutionary for its time, the town centre is showing signs of age and, in , plans were revealed for a major regeneration to take place over the next decade. Details are still being debated by the council, landowners and other interested parties. The church is a cathedral-like Grade 2 listed building. It is also the largest parish church to have been built in England since World War Two. The frame is constructed from a continuous pour of concrete into moulds, creating interlacing arches and leaving no apparent joints. There are twelve Purbeck-marble columns around the high altar and the external walls are clad in panels faced with Normandy pebble. The campanile houses the loudspeakers for an electro-acoustic carillon. Adjacent to yet separate from the residential parts of the town is the Industrial Area. There are many small- to medium-size firms as well. Stevenage BioScience Catalyst, a new science park aimed at attracting small and start-up life-sciences enterprises, opened in on a site next to GSK. In past years Stevenage Carnival has also been held, with a number of attempts to revive it. The town is still growing. It is set to expand west of the A1 M motorway and may be further identified for development. The main area of more recent[ when? Climate data for Stevenage.

Jump to navigation Jump to search Symonds Green is a neighbourhood within the English new town of Stevenage in Hertfordshire. Through the Conservation Area designation certain buildings in the locality that are of historical note despite nearby encroachment from later 20th Century housing , are protected from inappropriate development or change, thereby conserving a small part of this old rural hamlet. The original part of present building was built circa and was extended as it appears today [] around The ponds adjacent to the Pub are principal features of the Conservation Area. Two such cottages are to be found at either end of the Green today [] and can also be seen on the Ordnance Survey Map. By the 18th century a farm had developed on the site. The farm, of which the barn formed a part, is shown on a County map, and the Richardson map of Stevenage of To the west of Symonds Green is the A1 M motorway. Adjacent to the northbound carriageway of the motorway at this point is the route of a northâ€”south Roman road. They were once much larger, extending east of Symonds Green Lane, [11] but they were built upon in the s with the office facilities that are there today. Modern day Stevenage otherwise lies due east of Symonds Green, and extends for over two miles. The original route of The Meadway can still be followed on foot, from its origin at its junction with a track known as Kitching Lane just under the Motorway at the south-eastern corner of the Meadway playing fields, [13] to where it emerges opposite the western end of Brick Kiln Road. Owing to the arrival of the railway The Meadway was terminated by way of a footbridge across the railway line. There is no trace remaining of the footbridge, which would have emerged opposite the present filling station on the corner of Woolners Way and Trinity Road. Albans, Church of England. At the southern end of Symonds Green Lane, toward the Meadway playing fields, are a small number of s houses [16] originally built for the workers at Stevenage Nurseries which existed nearby on the land now occupied by a s housing estate, the service roadway of which provides the only vehicular access to the Conservation Area which is otherwise a Cul-de-sac. Until the late Summer of , at the southern end of the green, an information notice erected by the local authority [18] provided a brief and interesting account of the history of the area. Stevenage Environmental Services erected a new interpretation board for Symonds Green Common in The original board read: At the time of the Domesday Book it was part of the Manor of Woolenwick, and in the 13th century it was called Woolenwick Green. The tenants of the manor were allowed to graze their animals there. At that time it was kept by Elizabeth Moules, whose family farmed much of the land in the area. Symonds Green was the birthplace of the notorious poachers, the Fox twins , who were born in in a thatched cottage behind the Crooked Billet. Albert Fox lodged in a house adjoining the pub towards the end of his life. A number of the modern streets in the locality are named after popular British seaside holiday towns.
