Chapter 1 Master George and Mistress Jane Norbert Johnson had never met such strange people in all of his life, much less two on the same dayâ€”within the same hour even. Norbert, with his scraggly gray hair and his rumpled gray pants and his wrinkly gray shirt, had worked at the post office in Macadamia, Alaska, for twenty-three years, seven months, twelve days, andâ€”he looked at his watchâ€”just a hair short of four hours. Nice people and mean people. Ugly people and pretty people. Lawyers, doctors, accountants, cops. Old hags and young whippersnappers. Oh, and lots of celebrities, too. Something scary was afoot in Macadamia. The first stranger, a man, entered the small, cramped post office at precisely In doing so, he almost dropped a cardboard box full of letters clutched in his white-knuckled hands. He was a short, anxious-looking person, shuffling his feet and twitching his nose, with a balding red scalp and round spectacles perched on his ruddy, puffy face. He wore a regal black suit: When the man plopped the box of letters onto the post office counter with a loud flump, a cloud of dust billowed out; Norbert coughed for several seconds. It was, after all, the middle of November. The very instant, I assure you. You know, where they bury poor chaps with unbeating hearts? He had never been quite sure what it meant, but something told him it explained exactly how he felt at that moment. He scratched his chin, squinting at the odd little man. But if you must call me something, you may call me Master George. Norbert shook his head. Now, really, why so many questions? Is this a post office or a trial by jury? Then, reluctantly, Norbert looked down, a little worried the stranger might disappear once they broke eye contact. Each frumpy envelope also bore a unique stampâ€”some of which looked to be rare and worth serious money: Norbert looked back up at the man. Now, good sir, is there anything else I have to do? I want to make absolutely sure there will be no problem in the delivery of these letters.
