Inspiration Behind These Beats Do these beats contain samples? My inspiration comes from the amazing producers behind the instrumentals that drake raps over. My aim is not to emulate these beats, but to use them as inspiration. Like if I was a music producer right their in that studio with Drake and his team producing my own beat inspired by the OVO movement. Many up and coming hip hop artist like that sound and need beats, which have similarities but with my own take and twist with. We have tons of rap beats for sale here on The Corporatethief Beats website. What are some of your stand out Drake Instrumental Type Beats? These really helped with my creativity and learning curve with beat making. Some of my own Drake types beats that stand out include. Enemies, which is a very fast paced movement type beat. I Can which is in the style of Lord Know Instrumental more of gospel boom bap feel. The Purpose which is heavily influenced by The Language Instrumental. Pulse which is inspired by the beats in his work with Future on the album what a time to be alive. There is a common theme running through this type of hip hop music. He tends to change it up again and again but you can always here some common similarities. Pads sounds and the incorporation of trap drum sounds. As Drake has the baking of a recorded label to help him negotiate sample clearance. In recent years I have backed off sampled based music as I find it difficult to promote on the various website like that of Youtube Facebook and Soundcloud. So recently I have altered some of my own instrumentals to sound like they are sampled but, they are really just heavily processed original pieces of my own instrumentation. I would advise up and coming artist to stay clear of sampled based beats as you might find it difficult to promote or come across some legality issue. As more an more up and coming artist ask for these minimalist type trap beats I have adapted my style to keep both my melodic touch and a minimalist instrumental sound.

Chapter 3 : Thief (film) - Wikipedia

A last thought: If Jim and I had created B & E as gay characters they would be inauthentic coming from two straight men. However, I have now learned that many view them as representative of a loving gay relationship.

He backtracks to mid-April Max wants a haircut and asks Liesel to give him one. Liesel continues to bring newspapers to Max, as well as reports of her day to Max. He asks what the weather looks like. Liesel describes it in words that only a child can, saying that the clouds are like ropes and the sun is like a yellow hole. Max paints this picture on the basement wall and draws himself and Liesel walking the rope of clouds. Max begins to feel as if he is disappearing; he feels gray. The match is set up so that Max will lose, despite his efforts to fight back, and in the end Hitler uses his words to set the crowd upon Max. Liesel takes the washing for the last time to 8 Grande Strasse. This time, Liesel does. Then, Frau Hermann hands Liesel a letter and apologizes to Liesel, telling her to apologize to her mother, too. Frau Hermann says that Liesel can still come by and read. Liesel thanks her and leaves, then sits on the steps just outside and reads the note from the mayor, which outlines why the Hermanns are canceling their washing service. As she begins her walk home, Liesel becomes increasingly angry with the mayor and his wife, especially with the gift of The Whistler. Analysis Death compares hiding a Jew to gambling, to rolling a die, which is made up of seven sides. He uses this metaphor to describe the seven major events he discusses in this chapter that all result from this gamble. Her bond with Max deepens. Again, Max has dreams, but this time the dreams are during the day. Still, Max fights, as he has said he will always do. Liesel can see how much her words have injured Frau Hermann; their effect is so powerful that Liesel imagines physical wounds like blackened eyes and a bloody nose and lips.

Chapter 4 : New VR Title ROGAN Revealed at PAX Australia – VRFocus

The Dream Thief (also Mike Jupp's development name for The Dreamstone series) is the Pilot for the series released in to pitch the show. The pilot was animated by the studio Mill Valley Animation in Novato in the US state of California while Mike was working in America.

Summary Analysis Death apologizes for spoiling the ending, but he says he has little interest in mystery. Now he needs to explain how that book The Whistler ended up in that river. He divides the chapter into sections headed by the numbers on a special die, which represents the gamble inherent in hiding a Jew in Nazi Germany. Zusak uses another unorthodox storytelling device in this chapter by drawing out the sides of the die. This symbol of gambling emphasizes the risky crime the Hubermanns have committed by hiding Max – similar to but much more dire than the suspense Liesel feels when she steals a book. Active Themes The scene returns to the present, and Max is getting a haircut. Rosa and Hans argue about who will do it, but Max asks Liesel. She cuts his "feathery" hair and burns the evidence. Ilsa offers her The Whistler again but Liesel refuses. On the way home she searches trashcans for newspapers with empty crosswords for Max. Liesel sits in the basement and reads while Max does the crosswords. They rarely speak, but they feel united by their love of words. Like with Frau Hermann, Liesel builds her relationship with Max around books and language. Also like Frau Hermann, this relationship involves little actual talking – most of the words occur on a page, and the friendship is made up of actions more than conversation. Active Themes One day Liesel rushes into the house, boasting about the goals she scored in soccer, and then she goes down to the basement to tell Max. He asks her to describe the weather as well, and Liesel describes the sky in unintentionally poetic language. Liesel acts like Death here, capturing the colors of the sky with poetic words, and Max acts like Death in drawing out images of the words. Max has nothing but time and it seems a punishment just to stay alive. He starts exercising again, and then begins fantasizing about having a boxing match with Hitler. The two start to fight, and at first Max lets Hitler beat on him. Then he gets up and punches Hitler on the moustache. Hitler stands, turns to the crowd, and gives a speech asking them to climb into the ring with him, as the Jewish enemy has corrupted everything. The whole country of Germany climbs into the ring and beats on Max. Last comes Liesel, and she hands him a crossword. Hitler again becomes the personal face of evil and suffering. His only comfort is Liesel – her friendship and her words. Active Themes One day Liesel come downstairs and Max is doing push-ups. He tells her about his new daydream, and say he is training to fight Hitler. Later Max rips out the rest of Mein Kampf and starts painting it white with Liesel, Hans, and Rosa, so he can start a new book. It will be called The Word Shaker. Active Themes Death reveals that the die they have been rolling is actually seven-sided, and this last side is unlucky. In June of , Germany invades the Soviet Union, and Liesel and Max see the mayor in the newspaper telling people to prepare for hard times. Then Ilsa gives her a letter for Rosa, and Liesel realizes their last customer has canceled. She feels hurt and betrayed, even though Ilsa apologizes to her and says she can come back and read whenever she wants. Ilsa shepherds Liesel outside and shuts the door. The Hubermanns were already poor before the war, and now they have an extra mouth to feed with Max. She imagines her own dead brother standing next to her. Ilsa backs away slowly and Liesel leaves, crumpling up the letter and throwing it at the door. Liesel now takes the words she has learned and uses them for spiteful purposes – to cause suffering to Frau Hermann for her perceived betrayal. Liesel then goes downstairs and asks Max to teach her to do push-ups. Retrieved November 13,

Mid-sentence I paused, because something outside had caught my attention: Something that unmistakably was my bike. So I went back inside and closed the door. But nobody steals my bike that easily! So as quick as I could, I put flats on my feet, grabbed my keys and with my phone still in my hand I slammed the door behind me as I ran down the stairs of my building. I took a sprint over the sidewalk as I imagined getting some strange looks from passing car drivers. The distant silhouette of the man turned into a real size fellow that I was quickly approaching. So a few steps behind him I slowed my pace, adjusted to his gentle walking speed and started walking next to him. With a semi-calm voice I said: He was obviously surprised. I felt a mixture of confusion, adrenaline and growing annoyance. Why the hell did this guy think it would be OK to take my bike? I like my bike. I painted it myself. And I know it is old, but it is mine, not his. So I started an interrogation right there on the sidewalk. Why did he take my bike? What was he going to do with it? Where was he from? Where did he live? Where did he eat? Where did he sleep? He explained that he thought my bike was garbage ouch because it had a flat tire and stood outside there is a designated place to put bikes. There are at least five other bikes in front of every building in the street. My bike did have a flat tire and is really old and crappy, but I was planning on fixing that, the flat tire part at least. He wanted to trade in the metal for a couple of euros to buy food. As I started to calm down I learned that he was from Greece and lost his job. He came to The Netherlands but was on the street and ate either at the church or whatever he would find in the garbage. At this point I recognized a new feeling in my ongoing mixture of confusion: We stood opposite from each other, in silence. The silence started to become awkward. I took the bike from him, but it moved really heavily. Instead I took my keys and unlocked my bike so the wheels could move freely again. That seemed really funny to me on multiple levels. When we reached my front door, I grabbed my keys and came to a horrifying realization: That morning I went jogging and took the key from my keychain. This whole situation was becoming more and more absurd. Luckily for me, my roommate turned out to be home and let me in. I grabbed some fruit and crackers nearly the only edible things in my house at that moment and walked back down to hand them over to the guy. The one that was working properly and that I had used over the last two weeks. It felt as if owning two bikes was an inappropriate abundance, even though the other bike was really old as well. Not a lot of people have red bikes with white polka dots. If I ever see someone other than you around town with this bike I will bring it back to you. I returned to my room. The whole thing had been ridiculously absurd. At least I have a secret guardian bike watcher in the underground scene now.

Daydream Cloud Heavy finds that the sandwich he has made and stored safely away in the fridge has disappeared. Together with the Authoress, they hunt for the sneaky culprit. You know, one of those days when you have no inspiration to write. Then, I got a guest review and decided to write this little oneshot. She snuck behind him. He jumped up in surprise, knocking his head against the top of the fridge. She was always doing things like this that would upset her friends However, she need not have worried. Heavy would be fine - if he could take a bullet wound, why should he be unable to survive a little bump on the head? It reminded Daydream of that part of Dynamite where Taio Cruz sings about throwing your hands in the air but she decided that it was probably not the best time to mention random stuff like that. Heavy shook his head frantically. I remember very clearly that I made sandwich and put it in fridge! This was getting very awkward He removed his head from her shoulder and got a fierce look on his face. We will find this sandwich robber and crush him together! Tiny Cloud is credit to team! Daydream really did not appreciate lying on the cold, hard ground and got up. Heavy had thrown Scout against the wall. Daydream stood there, her hand covering her face. This was one of those times when she wished that she could break the No Mary Sues rule and solve the problem with her notebook Daydream sighed and was glad when Heavy finally finished his sentence. Although, it was only her friends at school who said that. Heavy stopped as soon as he heard Medic. You are all trying my patience! If he did have the sandwich, he would have waved it in your face, called you names, and made fun of you," she explained, with a raised eyebrow. Heavy was silent for a moment. She regretted it a moment later. We will kill Spy! She had a crush on him for like, ever. Who could not have a crush on someone as bad-ass as him? Daydream thought he must have been having a nap before they came along. She had a lot of experience with that. She could never get over the feeling when she was around Spy. Why does he have to be so mysterious Good day," Spy was about to close the door when Heavy grabbed him by the tie and pulled him out. Daydream discreetly rolled her eyes. Then again, he was cute when he did that. Spy stared at him right back. He knew how to stare, all right. He kept glancing at his tie, though. Daydream felt sorry for him. She had just remembered something. Heavy looked at her. She slowly backed away. Spy quickly caressed his beloved tie. Then Daydream broke into a run. Or the Life Extender Machine or whatever! He took out his cigarette case and lit a new cigarette, in which he proceeded to put into his mouth. XD Well, the chorus, that is. The author would like to thank you for your continued support. Dreams which revolve around theft are the psyche's way of indicating a fear of loss in your life.
