The Invisible Intruder is the 46th volume in the Nancy Drew Mystery Stories series. It was first published in under Carolyn Keene. It was first published in under Carolyn Keene. The actual author was ghostwriter Harriet Stratemeyer Adams.

I first read it from the school library, but naturally I had to get a copy for my very own. Most of the young people are prepared to play ghost-busters, but Rita Rodriguez is hoping for a real ghost or two. Intruder is interesting for a couple of reasons. First, it brings back Helen Corning Archer. Helen featured several of the early volumes before the series was rewritten in , but rarely had much of an active role in the investigations. This book gives her--and her husband and married friends--a somewhat larger part, though it is still Nancy and company who do most of the clue-finding. As Helen says when the group draws lots for sentry duty in their investigation of the phantom horse: I did enjoy that she and Jim were able to assist Nancy and Ned in the grand finale--capturing the crooks and handing them over to the police. The other interesting feature of this book is that Nancy and her friends set out to investigate five mysteries instead of just one. In the other books Nancy is interested in mysterious happenings at one location or surrounding one particular person. This time she and her friends move from place to place checking out incidents affecting a number of people. Of course, they find clues that indicate there may connections but this is the first mystery to cover so much ground. I had just as much fun reading this now as I did when I was young. Please request permission before reposting. I think I like it a little bit better the umpteenth time around reading it, particularly the last few chapters that talk about the giant clam, snail that builds shells on itself, and the starfish. I learned a lot about sea life! However, the previous chapters with the ghost hunting were pretty boring. Even though I am bumping up my rating to 4 stars, it really is more of a 3. I would place this book in the bottom half of I last read this book in and rated it 3. I would place this book in the bottom half of the 56 classic Nancy Drew mystery series.

Chapter 2 : "Forensic Files" Invisible Intruder (TV Episode ) - Plot Summary - IMDb

The Invisible Intruder is a children's story by Carolyn Keene (pseudonym) and the 46th book in the Nancy Drew series. Nancy Drew and her friends go on a ghost hunting expedition and become involved with a gang of thieves who concentrate their activities on collectors of valuable shells.

However, police were unsure about the validity of her story and began an intensive search of the crime scene. The evidence proved that she killed her two older sons with a knife, inflicted wounds on herself, cleaned the evidence, and created the story of a crazed intruder. Routier was convicted of first-degree murder. When investigators went through his Lubbock, Texas , apartment, they noticed a partial replacement of his bedroom carpeting with a large blood stain underneath. Leisha told Tim that Scott was losing interest in her. This was enough to indict both Leisha and Tim for murder. Debora Green lost two children in a fire that destroyed her Prairie Village, Kansas mansion. Debora and her previous husband Michael Farrar were questioned. Suspicions arose when Debora refused to cooperate during questioning. Police then questioned Michael and uncovered disturbing stories proving that Debora was dangerous. Witnesses told police that Shirley and her husband Ed argued in a bar the night before. Police first suspected Ed and arrested him after he confessed to the murder. However, the forensic evidence proved that Ed was innocent. Police discovered that his fingerprint matched the latent print left on the concrete block. Jarman was convicted of her murder. The fibers on her clothes were the only means for police to determine her abductor. Police grew suspicious of Cal Hughes who was washing his clothes at 1 a. They searched his car and found several fibers similar to the clothes that Melissa had worn to the party. An identical outfit was located and tested. The fibers matched, and Cal Hughes was convicted of abduction with intent to defile and given a year sentence. Joann would then collect additional life insurance if Robert suffered from an accidental death. Joann was arrested five years later, confessed, and pleaded guilty to murder. The rope used to tie the boys was unique. Another clue turned up when a brother of one of the boys was hypnotized and remembered a uniformed man in a tan car. Shortly after, someone noticed a strange car and gave the licence plate number to police. This vital information led to the capture and conviction of John Joubert , an enlistee in the Air Force who carried the same exact rope used to bind the two boys. He was convicted of both murders and later confessed to the murder of an year-old boy in Portland, Maine. When Mark and a friend returned home that evening, they found Karla dead. The police questioned neighbors Paul Main and John Prante, but they were considered low-level suspects. During the autopsy, they were able to re-examine bite marks found on her body. A computer enhancement gave a better view of the bite marks and the science of forensic odontology identified John Prante as the perpetrator. On July 15, , five years after the murder, Prante was found guilty and sentenced to 75 years in prison. Later that morning, Mrs. Molloy arrived to drop off her child at the Johnson home. Later on, Clayton Johnson married a year-old member of his church. When homicide investigator Brian Oldford heard this, he became suspicious and decided to reinvestigate. Clayton Johnson was arrested and convicted of first-degree murder. By examining the photos and nature of the injuries, the defense team was convinced that she had fallen backwards. The accidental fall scenario also accounted for the lack of defensive wounds on both Mrs. After serving 5 years in prison, Clayton Johnson won his appeal and was released from prison. Following extensive medical examinations, it was determined that Anna had been the victim of the deadly bacteria E. As early as , tests on samples of Odwalla juices found high levels of general bacteria because the company did not pasteurize its products. Federal and state inspection reports confirm that the company used two loads of apples with relatively high defect levels on the day that the juice was made. The genetic markings on the E. In , Lori found the courage to tell police what she saw in In , a concrete slab was removed from the yard, and a skeleton was found in the exact spot where Lori said it would be found. Gene was convicted of first degree murder and sentenced to life in prison. The couple soon engaged, and they moved into the Woody family home. In , Florena started complaining of muscle aches in her back and shoulders, and her doctor gave her antibiotics for her condition. However, Florena later died from fluid in her lungs caused by her illness. Investigators found deer mice which tested positive for a new form of the hantavirus. They determined that contact with the feces of the deer mice was what had caused the disease and that when the feces dried, the deadly microbe became airborne. Louis, Missouri and went for a minute jog. Before leaving, he said that he drew a bath for his wife Julie Thigpen-Post. Ed returned and called the front desk, stating that his wife had fallen in the bathtub and was not breathing, and she was dead when emergency response arrived. A second autopsy found 36 areas of bruising, not noted during the original autopsy. The death was ruled a homicide, and Ed Post was charged with first-degree murder and convicted. After serving six and a half years, Ed admitted to drowning his wife.

"Nancy Drew, forget the ghost hunt!" a male voice rasps on the telephone. Despite the mysterious warning, the teenage detective and a group of friends start out on a ghost-hunting expedition to investigate five places reputed to be haunted.

This is where we discuss your favorite vintage series books from Nancy Drew and the Hardy Boys to Trixie Belden and the Three Investigators to all other similar vintage series books. Nancy was invited because Helen and the other couples decided that they needed a sleuth with them to help solve the mysteries. Bess, George, Ned, Burt, and Dave are invited to go as well. This means that a total of 14 people will go on the ghost hunting trip. Their first stop will be Pine Grove Camp on Lake Sevane, where a self-propelling canoe appears on the lake. The third visit will be to the Red Barn Guesthouse, where at night, a phantom horse appears with its ghost rider chasing after it. Fourth, the ghost hunters will stop at a mountaintop inn that was once an old fort. People often see the ghosts of prisoners. The final stop will be at the home of a skull and shell collector which has an "invisible intruder" visit each night. This is an interesting mystery that would have been even better if all of the extra couples had not been invited. They have no purpose, other than cluttering up the setting. It gets funny as this happens over and over throughout the book. Here are a couple of examples. At supper, the other couples hear about the excitement. Later in the story, the ghost hunters arrive at the Red Barn Guesthouse. Right after the group arrives, a banging sound comes from the attic. It seems that Helen and Jim miscalculated by having Nancy and her friends along. They wanted Nancy to help them. Instead, Nancy gets all of the excitement, and the other couples have no part in the mystery. This book opens like so many other Nancy Drew books: Nancy gets warned by the villains! On page 3, Nancy receives a warning by phone. I thought it was strange that the villains already knew Nancy would be on the case. Nancy thinks it is strange as well, but then she decides that someone must have been near the fence while she was discussing the ghost hunting trip with her father in the backyard. That makes sense, but then This story is full of the stupidity that is present in all of the higher-numbered Nancy Drew books. On page 14, the couples are gathered around the fireplace when the front door opens and a large gust of air enters, scattering papers and sparks everywhere. The couples chase after a man who has a large bellows under his arm. This just seems stupid, kind of like when a man strapped peacock feet to his shoes in The Hidden Window Mystery. On page 34, Ned is captured underwater by a huge octopus. It turns out that the villain was carrying a rubber octopus and somehow managed to drag Ned away underwater while at the same time dragging the rubber octopus along as well. Another theory given by the young people is that the man may have been inside the rubber octopus. On page 46, Mrs. Tarpey tells the young people about the theft of a shell collection and how many of the shells are valuable. She then recites a bunch of historic information about specific rare shells. I am surprised that Mrs. Tarpey knows all of this and can recite it perfectly for Nancy and her friends. Had Nancy and her friends ever heard of a tape recorder or record player? On page 60, Bess is told by the medium that she will soon apply for a license for her own wedding. Bess begins crying as though this is the worst news ever. She is very concerned because Dave has to finish college first. The telegram reads, "RARE. She thinks that "medium" means Madame Tarantella, that she did a "rare" bit of work, and that her work was "well done. Really, did someone watch too many stupid cartoons and then create these plots? On page 74, an attorney named Mr. Kittredge just happens to know all about the shell and tells the girls its nickname and scientific name. He tells them where the shell can be found and about its value. How convenient that everyone Nancy meets knows all about shells! On page 98, Ned calls Nancy to tell her about his abduction and everything that has happened. The paper said, "Force sale red barn. The ghost hunters take turns watching for the phantom horse overnight. Do you want to guess when the horse finally appears? I am so shocked! On page , Nancy, Ned, Helen, and Jim are locked inside a cage with the skeleton of a dinosaur. Ned escapes, and Nancy devises a plan to trick the villain. She has Helen and Jim hide behind the skeleton. Jim ducks out and back behind the skeleton. He takes off his coat, messes up his hair, and appears briefly as Ned. The villain falls for it. This just proves how stupid all of these villains are. Shells are mentioned all through the story. The final stop at the skull and shell collector is mentioned at the start of the story, but Nancy never thinks about that as they find shells everywhere they go. Really, Nancy, shells are everywhere. The Invisible Intruder has a lot of problems, but I have always enjoyed it. I like the idea of journeying from one haunted place to another in order to discover the source of the various haunts. The book has some obvious flaws, but they have never prevented me from enjoying the story. The remaining couples are hardly ever mentioned, so their presence just adds unnecessary clutter to the story. Take out the other couples and make some of the events less stupid, and The Invisible Intruder could have been an outstanding Nancy Drew mystery. Posted by Jennifer White at 6:

Joe Twist A poem by Joe Twist about his struggle with the voices in his head. People feel them as inner voices, spiritual guides, the voice of a departed loved-one or the voice of God. This has been the case for Ron Coleman. On the phone from Scotland he told me about when he first started hearing voices. And I looked behind me and there was nobody there. And eventually I was hearing six and that led me into hospital, the voices are so intense and they always pick on the bits of us that are our weaknesses. They leave us feeling as if we are worthless and hopeless and we become victims of that, really. And they were all distinctly different voices were they? Oh yeah, they were very different. You were abused by a priest as a kid? Yep, I heard his voice really clearly and he was probably the most distracting of my voices. I also heard the voice of my first partner who died and she would say things like, kill yourself, we can be a family again. About a third of the people said that they would miss the voices if they disappeared, and a considerable number of those people said that the voices were helpful and guiding. But on the whole the voices that occur in the context of psychiatric illness are critical and cause the hearer to be distressed. He and his colleagues did a large study into the cause and treatment of auditory hallucinations. And they were particularly keen to capture the subjective experience of those who hear voices, to get under their skin, as he put it. For example, lead them to violence? And in a significant number those command hallucinations tell a person to do something "either dangerous to themselves or dangerous to others. Fortunately no harm came from that but the voice was so compelling that he had to do what to everyone is an extremely dangerous thing. In the following years she struggled with mental illness and was diagnosed with various conditions including depression, bi-polar disorder and psychosis. But a common symptom throughout was this sense of voices in her head. I call it the interpreter that sort of interprets a lot of the interactions that I might have with people. Why do you call the distressing side of these experiences the interpreter? Give me an example? Is the information usually correct? A lot of the time it is very correct yes. So going back to that example you gave me about the voice telling you, or the thoughts telling you to jump off the bridge, in what context was that? Were you under particular stress? Yes, yes, I was away in a different city of Australia, I was feeling particularly stressed by what I was doing at the time, it just got more and more and more in terms of severity. So have you ever taken medication? Both internal and external, like most of my experience I would explain as internal, the experience of hearing things and getting information. But at different times when I was in hospital I would have the external experience. Whereas your internal experience, you know that they are thoughts in your head? Lyn Mahboub, who is now a mental health advocate in Western Australia. Joe Twist Lynne Malcolm: What happens in the brain to determine the content of the hallucination? So could you tell me a little bit more about what we know about what happens in the brain with auditory hallucinations? Well a series of studies by our group and others has shown that during hallucinations there are regions of the brain that become active. And those regions commonly involve the regions of the brain, the temporal lobe under the temple that are associated with the processing of normal sounds. Have you heard of phantom limb syndrome, where a person who might have had an amputation can feel their arm or leg even though the leg has been amputated? As we heard earlier, Ron Coleman was harangued by six voices after a cycle of sexual abuse as a boy and later the suicide of his first partner. Events which he says shaped his illness and his life. He spent six and a half years out of the next ten in and out of hospital. His treatments included electro-convulsive therapy and antipsychotic medication, but he emerged from hospital no better. So actually I came out of the system in a sense worse than I went in, in terms of the voice hearing experience. Because the voices never changed, they were always there. So what was the turning point, because you now manage them very differently? Tell me about what happened to turn you around. I was in Manchester, I was in hospital and I heard a support worker who suggested that I went to this new group that was just forming in Britain called the Hearing Voices Network. Even at the very first meeting it made sense to me, a woman said to me, do you hear voices? And then I started going more and more to the self-help group, to the Hearing Voices group. Are you able to constantly learn by that? And in a sense when I have major decisions to make now I would discuss it with my voices in exactly the same way you would discuss it as an internal dialogue in your own head. So is there a sense that the voices can be helpful for you now? Oh very much so, I mean through the group and through working on issues in my own life I was able to take control over the voices and experience and get on with my life. Married, got children, done all the things that I really wanted to do but was unable to do through that period of pain when the voices had control. Ron Coleman has championed the Hearing Voices Network in the United Kingdom and plans to visit Australia later this month to help develop the network here. Well by far the most important planks in treatment are the relationship with a therapist, talking about the voices, and medication. There is no doubt that the most effective treatment for psychotic symptoms including hallucinations is anti-psychotic medication. The Mental Health Research Institute in Melbourne has established a free voices clinic for people who are distressed by their voices. They teach them coping strategies like these. First of all trying to help a person understand other explanations for their voices. Sometimes, say, with command hallucinations, a person will feel that they really have to follow what the voice is telling them, otherwise immense harm will come to them. And so in the clinic there will be a testing of that theory and trying to encourage a person to not follow the voices and to find out that the consequences of not following what the voices say is not anywhere near as catastrophic " or is in fact not a problem at all. So in a sense, challenging the voices, keeping a diary in terms of the frequency of the voices and the things that cause the voices to get worse. The Hearing Voices Network was initiated by a Dutch psychiatrist, Marius Romme, in the early 90s, after one of his patients, Patsy Haig, impressed on him that the distressing voices she was plagued by were not a figment of her imagination " they were real. Together the doctor and patient went on a television chat show and were overwhelmed by audience response. Your experience is real because traditionally the understanding was if someone was hearing voices or seeing things that it was a hallucination or a delusion, that it was not a real experience. Can you tell me a little bit more about the coping strategies, besides sharing your experiences with others, that have the same experience, what are some of the coping strategies that you notice people use and what have you used to help you on the path to recovery? Well some, just to list off a couple of things, a lot of the time people have negotiation with the voices. They might have structured time techniques, which is whereby you will listen to the voices at a particular time throughout the day and then you ask them to leave you alone at the rest of the time of the day so that you can go to work and do various other activities. One voice hearer that I spoke to, she had been working with her voices quite successfully in some ways but then developed blackouts, and she went to the doctor and was diagnosed that she had something like atypical epilepsy. So her partner engaged in dialogue with one of her voices. This other voice then taught the new voice how to do so in a way that was going to be productive for them all, and subsequent to that the blackouts stopped and she was able to get resolution. Because a lot of the time living with the experience of hearing voices produces certain effects such as social withdrawal, anxiety and various other difficulty in having conversations and things like that. So through managing the voices, those kinds of effects which are often misunderstood as symptoms of an illness, you know, can be better worked with and navigated. I believe as part of the Hearing Voices Network, which is well and truly established in the UK but also I think growing here, one of the successful strategies some people who hear voices have used is to get others to have a dialogue with their voices, or even to get the voices to speak with each other. What do you think of this sort of approach and what might the mechanism be there? So what the Voices Network is doing with information about the frequency with which people actually hear voices in the general community, is trying to normalise the experience. Giving a biological explanation is in fact very reassuring. It is essentially a way of normalising that experience. And there are, of course, many examples in history where people have heard voices, famous people have heard voices such as Joan of Arc and Socrates. So I think for example having the voices network established in Australia is a great idea. For further information, links and references about this and past programs go to abc.
