The king of suburbia Levitt ushered in new way of American life, spawning thousands of copycat communities By Matt Schneiderman April 30, It also got the term Levittown into textbooks, museum exhibits and documentary films as a synonym for a new way of American life. While his identical tract houses offered young military families an opportunity to own a home with a yard, critics viewed the community as void of character. The builder died broke in at age 86, after years of overspending and making unwise investments. Born in Brooklyn in , William Laird Levitt joined the real estate business that his father Abraham founded in He served a tour of duty with the Navy during the war, but afterward joined his father and his brother Alfred in pioneering the post-war housing boom. His company led the first wave of suburbanites out to Long Island with the promise of more space and an escape from the claustrophobic city, purchasing 1, acres of potato farmland near Island Trees in Nassau County. The first family to move into a Levittown home arrived three months later, in October. In the case of our houses, it was the workers who moved, doing the same jobs at different locations. The identical Cape Cod homes sat on seventh-of-an-acre lots. To speed construction, there were no basements concrete slabs were simply poured directly onto the lot and no garages. Each home measured square feet and had two bedrooms, a living room, a kitchen and a bath, as well as an unfinished second floor so the homeowners could expand upward. The production method kept costs low, and government assistance from the GI Bill, which offered housing loans and low-interest mortgages to veterans, made the houses affordable. My parents had started out by renting a Levitt home. One day, they heard that their house was to be sold, so my mother ran down to the construction-mobiles onsite and signed for the house with just her signature. Polly Dwyer, Levittown Historical Society president, bought her Levittown home with her husband in The town remains more than 90 percent white today. A recent profile of the developer cited a Saturday Evening Post article that quoted Levitt: That is their attitude, not ours. We did not create it, and we cannot cure it. As a company, our position is simply this: We can solve a housing problem or we can try to solve a racial problem, but we cannot combine the two. Yet while it is clear that Levitt was glad to be providing affordable housing to middle-income families, he also thrived on the recognition. I want to build a town to be proud of. Murray noted that he left a large charitable imprint, donating land for a library, schools, synagogues and churches. He understood that a community is built on institutions, not just with houses. It was deficient and problematic as a human habitat, even apart from the question of its sustainability. It recently declared that it would become the greenest American suburb by encouraging energy efficiency. According to published reports, Levitt also borrowed against his ITT stock to build subdivisions in places like Iran, Venezuela and Nigeria. His foreign projects flopped, leaving him millions of dollars in debt. Despite several attempts to rebound from these financial setbacks, Levitt never recovered his fortune or influence. Estate- and yacht-less, Levitt died in of kidney disease. So, too, does Levittown, N.
