Share via Email Jennifer Klinec: Graeme Robertson for the Guardian Jennifer Klinec never wanted a big wedding. Jennifer, with cropped, blond hair, a wide smile and an endearing air of bewilderment at the twists her life has taken, tells me over a coffee that she knew little about temporary marriages before she decided to visit Iran. In fact, when she arrived in the beautiful desert city of Yazd – famous for its labyrinthine old city mudbrick buildings and ancient wind towers – she was looking for women, not men. Having already travelled widely, including to Yemen and Syria, to learn new recipes, the former cookery writer was determined to find a housewife to teach her about Persian food. So, when she was approached by a slightly grumpy year-old man called Vahid, she was only interested in hearing about his mother, she says. He was shorter than me and looked angry – he has bushy eyebrows and long eyelashes and always looked disapproving. When I travel I always try and get out of the capital city to somewhere slower and smaller. I knew Yazd would be very beautiful and the food would be good. But the scrutiny the couple were under was suffocating. What do you know about her past? But in Yazd when we sat next to each other in public I had to face the opposite direction and pretend to read. It was a form of courtship I had never experienced before. But even as a child she was expected to look after herself. Her parents were from impoverished backgrounds in Eastern Europe, and intent on making a success of their business. Their long hours meant Jennifer and her sister would be woken by a phone call in the morning, make their own way to school, and come home again to an empty house. Birthdays were forgotten or dismissed and when the family did eat together the conversation centred on business orders. Today they are very close, she says. Unemployed and sexually inexperienced, he had never travelled outside Iran, and his parents expected him to have a family-approved match, find a government job and live down the road. But because sharing a hotel room would have been illegal, the couple decided to have a temporary marriage. Inside the Islamic Republic, sigheh marriages are controversial. Critics complain that they are a form of legalised prostitution, while supporters argue that the short-term marriage contracts which can last anywhere from a few minutes to 99 years are a pragmatic loophole in a country that criminalises extra-marital sex; offering legitimacy and a right to inheritance for children. When Vahid wandered off, a young mullah sat down next to Jennifer, talking to her in French. When he told him about their predicament, he too was supportive. And then he signed it – and that was that. She said it with such finality that I felt tears welling up. It felt like I had been punched in the stomach and everything was collapsing inside me. So he sang to me to try and comfort me. Finally – five years ago – they decided it was time for Vahid to move to the UK. But she says Vahid loves the multiculturalism of London, the blending of its history and modernity and the friends he has made in the UK. Looking back, Jennifer says she is surprised when people expect her to be ashamed of her temporary marriage. The tradition is said to be pre-Islamic and proponents argue that they continued to be acceptable in the early years of Islam during times of war, or as a pragmatic solution for pilgrims and travellers who were away from home for long periods. Sigheh marriages, as they are called, can last for any prearranged time from a few minutes to 99 years, and are not always registered, as a usual marriage would have to be. Couples can even conduct them themselves and they can be endlessly renewed. Some couples are said to use them before deciding – or before they can afford – to settle down permanently. There are even reported cases where young men and women who are not in relationships but want to flat share or travel together find them expedient. But critics maintain that they are no more than a cover for legalised prostitution.
