One thing I noticed is just how unique manuscript materials are. Fitted to the meanest capacities. The print book has only 25 pages of instruction, followed by 16 pages of tunes for practice and enjoyment – small enough to prompt aspiring singers to copy out their own selections and have them bound at the back of the book. You can see high-quality images of the entire book using the Harvard Library Viewer ; you can see my catalog record of the manuscript portion in the RISM database. Colonial New England being what it was, all the tunes, both in the original print book and in the subsequent manuscript additions, were for sacred texts. Most of them were intended to be sung to metrical psalms, which were commonly sung in Puritan and Congregational churches of the time. Prior to this time, singing in church was a bit of a mess: The music reformers of the day set out to fix this by systematically training people in musical literacy. Old habits die hard, however, and churches split over tension between the resulting factions. Thomas Hubbard served as deacon for Old South Church for 25 years, and as treasurer to Harvard College from to His daughter, Thankfull, was 14 years old at the time when she acquired the book: There is a record that the same year, she wore a hot-pink silk frock, presumably for the first time or for a special event. I discovered this by surprise, as I was researching Thankfull Hubbard, on the blog of Holly Gates – who currently owns the gown. In fact, this gown resides in the same town as I do! Perhaps I will get the chance to see it this summer. Many of the tunes have handsomely executed titles imitating the style of music engraving of the time; these may well have been copied out of one or more printed collections of psalm tunes. One tune has the name Thankfull Hubbard written next to it. Rather, she may have been pleased with her execution in copying out the tune and text – which is quite nicely done for a young amateur! The tunes in this section are still sacred vocal music, but they differ from the tunes before it in a number of ways: Many of them are written using oval noteheads, while all those in the first section contained only diamond-shaped noteheads. There are many fusing tunes by contemporary New England composers such as Daniel Read and Oliver Brownson, as opposed to old anonymous psalm tunes. Might it have been a tribute to the deceased Mrs. It would not be the only tribute following her death: Comparing multiple copies like this raises some questions about how and why people added to their books. One thing that stood out to me was how similar many of these additions were to each other. More interesting still, this layout often imitates the style of printed collections, such as A supplement to the New Version of the Psalms. This collection was often bound at the end of the commonly used metrical psalter by Tate and Brady and includes many of the tunes later appended to tunebooks; it was printed a number of times in Boston in the early s. Imagine the following scenario: Music is especially suited to this purpose. Music is a very personal thing; especially in the context of multiple-part vocal music, it must be used actively along with other people. His records appear in RISM, an international music manuscript database which gives more detail than a HOLLIS record can and thus allows a deeper understanding of these materials and their context.

Here are also her letters and the important proposals for her volumes of poetry. Additionally, Carretta has added work by her black contemporaries Lucy Terry Prince, Jupiter Hammon, and Francis Williams to help readers contextualize black literary activity in the late eighteenth century. Carretta has also written an illuminating introduction and included suggestions for further read and notes. In short, this is a fantastic edition for the specialist, the student, and the informed general reader. It will be widely used. Expertly edited, it is a masterpiece of textual scholarship. Recognising her talent, her owners gave her an education and Wheatley became an internationally known poet before the age of twenty, the first published woman of African descent.
