Dancing waiters, live bands and flying tits 26 Nov Wednesday was a lot of fun. I went with new friend G to an event organised by dating network Inner Circle. So I was a bit wary. The second event was at the Box. The prude-o-meter then went off the scale as a performer appeared in her underwear, climbed a column of silk suspended from the ceiling, then proceeded to remove her smalls with her toes under my nose, before performing the rest of the routine naked. I was lost for words mid-chat with a guy at the bar, with my view entirely obscured by flying tits. It certainly made for a different kind of small talk. So I approached my latest mid-week excursion with a degree of curiosity. Thankfully on arrival there was no sign of a sex dungeon and we were immediately given free cocktails by a rather flirty waiter. There was also a live band. Things were looking up. There were plenty of hot guys there but G had other ideas. While everyone else was making polite small talk, G and I made friends with the band and in no time I was teaching them sign language for the most juvenile things I could think of. I remember drinking a lot, talking to a stoned Italian called Marco in an overly tight shirt, getting a salsa lesson from one of the waiters, getting into an argument with a hypnotherapist and smoking a roll up in a room upstairs for the sheer naughty novelty of being able to smoke indoors, despite ditching fags in my 20s. The nearest I came was when I got warned for standing too near a sexy Mark Strong lookalike by his secretary yes I know. I was confused about why she was there too. I think perhaps she was part of his advance vetting process. I thought Oo I could do with one of those. Your own private vetter. It was 1am and I realised I was deteriorating faster than I could lower my standards. It was time to leave. So are dating events worth the trouble? Are they just a collection of undateble singletons trying to get a shag? Although I did end up dating that guy I was speaking to at the bar at The Box for 3 months. Author claudinesnape Posted on.

Chapter 2 : How to Get Rid of Frogs (with Pictures) - wikiHow

I thought that "Too Many Frogs" was a great children's book. This book is about a Rabbit that does all the cooking and other duties for himself, and every night he reads himself a story. One night Froggie comes to his door and asks to listen to a story.

The state of my affairs. Unfortunately, this blog has taken a back burner in my life and it frustrates me. Alas, another blog for another day. Today, I intend to return to the original intent of this blog: Who are we kidding? I had a blind date with a friend of a work colleague. Unfortunately, that original meeting was not as memorable for me as it was for him. Nonetheless, we met for drinks. We had a nice time with our drinks and talked about all the stuff I would normally want to talk about: small town feels, religion, career aspirations, etc. That was in January I think? I barely missed the opportunity to chat with Sean. He came to D. As expected, he was a perfect gentleman in all of our correspondence. I accidentally went on a date with a work colleague. We met for coffee where I thought he wanted to talk about research. Realizing what was happening, I politely declined and that seems to be that. Fawkes and I finally met up! I say "finally" because I actually had to cancel our first meeting time given the ultimate demise of my sweet car, Jezebel. He was a complete champ about it and really, I did enjoy our appetizers and desert we decided to share those rather than have dinner. We had a great conversation and he was wonderfully calm when the band of rings I bought at the Louvre in Paris broke and beads scattered all over the floor of the restaurant. I mean, we are now Facebook friends so "hey, Fawkes! She also wanted me to "stop waiting around and start living my life. And then I changed the conversation by asking her if she wanted to adopt a dog from Even Chance. My church started a series about relationships last week, which was incredibly interesting. The message was about the difference between desires and expectations, and more specifically about how our desires can become problematic

Chapter 3 : Too Many Frogs in My Pond, What Can I do?

This is the next book my daughter's Kindergarden class is reading. It's a wonderful story written by Sandy Asher and illustrated by Keith Graves.

The reason for this is because they consume insects that can be damaging to plants. At the same time, it is also possible for frogs to overtake ponds, making too much annoying noise and overpopulating. Frogs are attracted to ponds for breeding and feeding purposes. If there are too many frogs in your pond and you are wondering what to do, all is not lost. In order to slim down the frog population in your pond or to eliminate them, there are a few methods you can apply to control this.

Relocate The Frogs Relocate the frogs you catch. Prod frogs in buckets you can put around the pond area. This is usually the area where frogs are most active and noisiest. Use a broom handle or stick to get frogs into your buckets. Cover the buckets and relocate the frogs to a different area at least a half-mile away, is the recommendation.

Increase Water Movement One way you can protect your pond from too many frogs is to make it hard for them to breed. When you add accessories and machines that create water movement, it is unlikely that the frogs will be able to thrive. You can use waterfalls, water wheels, and fountains which move water and discourage breeding.

Add Fish When you add fish to the pond, this prevents frogs from being able to breed since there is an increase in the movement of water, as well.

Trim down plant life When there are lush plants around and in your pond, the frogs consider this as a great hiding place and perfect shelter. When you get rid of plant overgrowth, there are fewer chances that frogs will decide to make your pond their home.

Get Rid Of Their Food You can get rid of the frogs in the lake by getting rid of the insects they eat. You can use a safe brand of pesticides to get rid of the population of insects that attract frogs. Treat every area of your pond including piles of leaves, lights, gutters the area around it and the plant areas. When you eliminate the insects that serve as frog-food, you then eliminate the frogs.

Use Bird Netting Create a fence out of bird netting around your pond. You can use a net that is two feet in height and bury six inches of it in the ground. New frogs are prevented by a net to enter the pond. You can then deal with the ones that are already in your pond later on. Or, you can keep the current population of frogs in your pond to eat harmful insects while preventing new frogs from coming in. A net prevents frogs from infesting your pond. With these methods, too many frogs in your pond will thankfully be a thing of the past!

But it was really time consuming and ultimately I'm just trying to elicit a response to find out if they can spell/don't use too many emojis and aren't a fuck wit, sex pest or weirdo, so I can judge whether it's worth me persevering.

Observations on dating from a wannabe Princess Leia Menu When banter goes wrong 26 January Good banter is the holy grail in dating. The display of wit and verbal dexterity puts a lot of skills on show. Lightning fast reflexes, creativity, a certain sophistication provided you stay on the right side of naughty and, if texting, a good test of if you can spell. You need to give them a chance to show they can take you on in a bit of verbal jousting. To charm you with their prowess. It started off well enough. He had a slightly sincere look about him and was exceeding polite, which I found a bit off putting. After a few playful jibes from me he started taking the piss back. He was a reasonably good looking guy, but he had good banter so immediately went to the top of the class. We ended having a real laugh and going for something to eat. Well it was all in the banter. It took a turn for the worst. It got whispers it dirty. Now dirty banter is the bedrock of any good relationship, or friendship for that matter. They were still within the bounds of decency and were actually quite funny so I gave as good as I got. But then he came out with a few comments that were total filth. And when I tried to steer the conversation onto safer territory he carried on, like he was just getting warmed up. Soon pretty much every other comment from him had a sex toy reference. Just a bit creepy. I suggested we call it a night. We went our separate ways. He misread his audience. I wanted a charming witty comeback machine but instead got Frankie Boyle on heat sigh.
