

Chapter 1 : Famous Quotes from Beowulf

The game will mainly be focused around team and character development, taking quest from the guild and exploring the world. This world is built from the point of view that what isn't seen is not detailed so feel free to make up place names, people ect and we will try to keep a consistent world.

Seventeen cavalry regiments were also mustered, as well as two light artillery regiments. Camp Douglas , located near Chicago, was one of the largest training camps for these troops, as well as Camp Butler near Springfield. Both served as leading prisoner-of-war camps for captive Confederates. Several thousand Confederates died while in custody in Illinois prison camps and are buried in a series of nearby cemeteries. Other major supply depots were located at Mound City and across the Ohio river at Fort Anderson in Paducah, Kentucky , along with sprawling facilities for the United States Navy gunboats and associated river fleets. One of which would take part in the nearby Battle of Lucas Bend. Leading major generals with Illinois ties included Ulysses S. Schofield , John A. Logan , John A. Brigadier General Elon J. Farnsworth , who began his career in the 8th Illinois Cavalry, died at the Battle of Gettysburg. President Lincoln maintained his home in Springfield, Illinois , where he is buried. Over soldiers from Illinois units would win the Medal of Honor during the conflict. Union Homefront support[edit] The Chicago city government and voluntary societies gave generous support to soldiers during the war. A pair of Chicago-based women, Mary Livermore and Jane Hoge , organized a pair of large expositions, the Northwest Sanitary Fairs, where cash generated from the sale of donated items was later used to purchase medical supplies for the soldiers. Mary Ann Bickerdyke , a resident of Galesburg , was a noted nurse for the Western armies. Workers in various factories and mills, as well as the port and stockyards, helped provide a steady source of materiel , food, and clothing to Illinois troops, as well as to the general Union army. Mound City foundry workers converted river steamboats into armored gunboats for Federal service. With traditional Southern markets cut off by the war, the port of Chicago rose in prominence as Illinois expanded trade with the Great Lakes region. War politics[edit] During the Presidential Election , two men from Illinois were among the four major candidates. Illinois voted in favor of Springfield resident Abraham Lincoln , votes or Of minor consequence in the statewide results were Southern candidates John C. Confederate Homefront support[edit] Copperheads[edit] Opposition views of the Peace Democrats or " Copperheads" filled the columns of The Chicago Times, the mouthpiece of the rival Democratic Party. At one point early in the Gettysburg Campaign in June , Union troops forcibly closed the newspaper at bayonet point. It was only reopened when Democratic mobs threatened to destroy the rival Republican paper and President Lincoln intervened. Green saw the War as unjust and Lincoln as a despot who had to be stopped. He wrote vicious denunciations of the administration in local newspapers. He was arrested for sedition in After his release in August , he became the grand commander of the secret Order of American Knights in Illinois, which fought restrictions on civil liberties. Green was funded by the Confederate government to arrange riots at the Democratic National Convention in Although the riots never materialized, he continued giving antigovernment speeches until he was again arrested in November After this arrest, he agreed to testify for the government about the activities of the Knights; his testimony implicated others but ignored his own deep involvement in antigovernment plots.

I was about 13 or 14 and it was on bicycle and one relied on tips more than any payment that was being made. The job started in the height of the winter, snow on the ground, miserable weather, freezing cold and then I rode my bike with a basketful of meat. I delivered it by hand and I got tips between 25 and 50 cents, so I needed to do a lot of deliveries to add up to dollars. Can you remember the first time you were paid for anything musical? Was that the catalyst for the rest of your career? From that show one of the investors, Frank Streich, was a very hot commercials director and he asked me to write the music for the commercial he was doing for the Cheese Board. I discovered that commissions in advertising paid very well. Did you get paid one-off lump sums or on a royalty basis? I composed but I also arranged and produced the sessions so the total fee for my creative side went to me plus a budget for the production costs and the fees increased the bigger the campaign was. I did music for Abbey National for 24 years. I did every piece of thematic music for 26 years for LBC until it was sold to Chrysalis. TV-am Good Morning Britain; that ran for 12 years. I did a piece of music for an Esso commercial, which ran for 12 years. Then again you can have a one-month campaign that the music is just as good; it just happens to be attached a campaign that has a much more finite life. Oh, the list goes on and on. I lost count of the Ferraris that I have and the houses that I have. But seriously, the one house I do have is the one I have in Shenley in Hertfordshire and my one car. What impact has it had on you financially? And if it fails it will definitely downsize our lifestyle in every way. Does money make you happy? Have you had any brushes with financial fraud? My card was swiped at an Indian restaurant in West Hampstead once on the Friday night before my family and I were due to go on a holiday that Sunday. What do you like least about dealing with money? Money should be as private as it can be because it can be a separator with friends or associates but we all have to live in the same world and therefore we all need money to survive within it.

Actually, Thanksgiving put this way sounds like what I do every week with dice, cards and game pieces instead of turkey and side dishes. The time after Thanksgiving dinner was traditionally a time for games at my grandparents house when I was a kid. After the dishes were cleared, some of my uncles would sack out on the couch in front of a football game on TV but I always lingered at the table where the real games were happening. My grandmother, great aunts, aunts and mom would hold court at one end of the room-length table with a few rounds of Bridge and family gossip. At the far end, some other aunts and uncles hauled out a well worn Scrabble board and played a steady game of vocabulary one-upmanship. Some of my cousins would spread around on the hallway floor for games of War , Parcheesi and Hi Ho! As the eldest of my many cousins, I always sat at the big table for dinner and there I mostly remained watching the adults play their games. My brother is my oldest gaming partner dating back to the 70s and 80s when we first discovered oddly-shaped dice and little metal miniatures to paint. We are both fortunate to have wonderfully understanding wives who who have partnered with us in raising a second generation of tabletop gamers, and all of us will be present in Brooklyn for Thanksgiving this year. After dinner games Our tastes in games range wider than the traditional board and card games favored by the older generations in my family. Even so, getting four adults and five kids boys and girls ranging in ages 10 to 16 all engaged in the same game today remains a challenge. Dixit makes for a light but engaging game right after dinner with the various family members pairing off into story-telling and story-deciphering teams. This is a great multi-generational game to play since the kids can just as easily out-baffle the adults by using the key game component they always carry – their imaginations. Guillotine switches the tone and ratchets up the humor for the Francophiles and budding historians with a twisted sense of humor. Nothing says family time at our dinner table like the beheading of aristocratic one-percenters during the French Revolution , all played with goofy cards. It might be a bit too off-color for some families, but all our kids dig this one. For the classically-romantic, multiple hands of Love Letter makes for a royal crowd pleaser as cards are quickly played in a quest to win the heart of the fair princess. The Batman version will also make a first appearance this year, switching up courtiers with DC Comics heroes and super villains. Ultimate Werewolf seems to fit the natural progression from dinner into evening. My extended family can be a bit on the boisterous side, so squaring off as villagers versus a werewolf threat in tense minute games. As the evening rolls on well past dessert, a couple pots of coffee and a few drinks, some of the kids and adults will inevitably drift away from the table. For those of us who remain, a rowdy round of our favorite Letters From Whitechapel makes for a grand late night hunt for Jack The Ripper. Black Friday games The Friday after Thanksgiving is a day off for many, and hoards of Americans are up early, out the door and racking-up credit card debt with overly-publicized Black Friday shopping. Since I do everything I can to avoid the masses over the holiday weekend, the Friday after our family feast presents a rare full day to be filled with gaming. I usually max out at about players in these games, so having up to five players around the table will be a treat. The Boardgame is one of the granddaddys of civilization-building games. Players march toward victory through different paths of warfare, culture and technology, allowing each player to work to their strengths and interact with human history along the way. With the Fame and Fortune and Wisdom and Warfare expansions, more possibilities and a fifth player are added into a game which stretches across the eons and a few hours of play. The game quickly goes from bad to worse over a couple hours, and working together as a group is the only way of surviving. This is a big, beautiful game set in a sleepy New England Town inexplicably invaded by netherworld beasts. Adventurers team up, acquire weapons and magical items and seek to destroy the beasts who threaten the world with dominating insanity and destruction. Events, monsters and player characters all come with a deep narrative that unfolds throughout the game, taking this game off the board into a terrifically eerie role-playing experience. While not a long time commitment, the card-driven Marvel Superheroes Legendary is best played in a big group of superhero players teaming up to foil the evil plans of an arch nemesis. My brother and I have been huge Marvel Comics fans for decades, so getting into a game which has characters leaping from the page to the table is still as much of a thrill for us in our late 40s as it is for our kids. Every family has their holiday traditions, and each generation builds on these and creates their own new traditions. Games remain a constant thread for my extended family through the holiday run from Thanksgiving through Christmas. The themes, mechanics and mechanics may have changed over the years, but at the root of our gaming is the chance to spend a few hours playing with those closest to us. This Thanksgiving, step away from the screens, clear the table and find your own gaming tradition with your family and friends.

Robert Kennedy " they wed. More Reviews TV Review: Blamed for his death, she goes to San Francisco to pursue a career in singing. A few guardian angels and lucky breaks later, she is headlining at a club. She eventually makes it to Hollywood, thanks to her sleazy personal manager Ernie Ted Wass , who wants to get really personal. She and Spencer run into each other and seek each other out; she tells him goodbye several times, he keeps showing up. He gets her off, she goes back to the ranch, she tell him goodbye again. They are reunited at the end. Biggest problem is that none of the action or events make much sense. Why go to San Francisco for a showbiz career? Why would Spencer marry the ultra-Establishment Elizabeth when what he really wants to do is spend two years in China helping earthquake victims? The pic has a hectic pace, with most scenes except the sex scenes lasting about as long as a commercial. Torpid acting gives pic a schizophrenic feel. Only decent perf comes from Wass. Cramer and producer Elaine Rich looks low-budget. There are no costumes or details that suggest a particular era; putting glasses on Spencer seems to be the only concession to the passing of time. Considering the fun one could have using showbiz and politics as backdrops, telepic is a real disappointment. However, some might find it a good alternative to Monday Night Football. His father was a member of a noble family while his mother was born in a different land to a family who had very little importance at all. They met one day when Celebring went to her town on a diplomatic assignment. He fell hard and fast, and he brought her back to his home as soon as could be arranged. Their marriage was strong, but Celebring endured intense scrutiny and criticism for marrying someone of lower social status. This criticism followed his young son, Aramil, who was born only a year after their marriage. As the son of a nobleman, he was given the best education, but as the son of a commoner, he was given little respect amongst his peers. To compound the problem, Aramil was never especially book smart. Others on his same level often appeared much smarter than him, and they were never shy about reminding him of that fact. The elf who seemed to derive the most pleasure from this was Valin. Ultimately, he decided to keep his gift to himself, and he trained day and night to master his newly chosen craft. Aramil found solace with a classmate, Dara. They began spending a lot of time together and eventually fell in love. Aramil, finally eager to show his worth, elected to go. Dara offered to travel with him. He accepted and, along with the others from Osilon, they headed off to the site of the tournament. The competition was strong, but to the surprise of all involved, Aramil emerged victorious. The celebration was short-lived. The following day, the war came calling. An army from Tairynal marched across the border and attacked. Aramil, along with the scores of fey who had competed the previous day, aided in the defense of his country. Though he cut down scores of human soldiers, his efforts were ultimately in vain as the defenders were routed by the more experienced humans. Unable to accept her loss, Aramil linked up with the counter-attacking force. He and Valin, who had apparently survived the attack as well, teamed up and were able to quietly flank the now human defending force and eliminate key targets with the skill of expert marksmen. With these targets neutralized, the defending force became confused and were eventually defeated. After the battle, credit for what Aramil and Valin had done was largely taken by the general of the fey army, General Soveliss. Aramil was slightly annoyed, but ultimately, it made no difference to Aramil, for Dara was nowhere to be found. Aramil left Verisa soon after the battle. He had no real interest in joining the war, and he had to find out what had become of Dara. Before he left, he sought out Valin and thanked him for his help during the battle. Valin reciprocated the feeling. Aramil traveled to the Neutral Lands hoping to hear word of her specifically, or even just information on what had become of the citizens of the city. Instead, he began hearing word of his long lost paternal cousin, Trindolin. Rumors have brought Aramil back to the Neutral Lands. Aramil stands a modest five foot ten. His lithe frame attracts little attention, and he tends to get lost in crowds. His long, blonde hair hangs over his pointy ears and down, coming to rest on his shoulders. Naturally good-looking and extremely humble, Aramil credits his parents with his good looks. His leather armor carries a greenish hue, with the symbol of Melora on the left shoulder pad and the symbol of Corellon on the right. His cloak carries the same greenish coloration, and his piercing green eyes seem to glow from the darkness beneath the hood. His longbow sits strung across his back at an opposite angle to his black leather quiver, which holds white-feathered arrows, and two shortswords hang at his sides. Aramil is quiet, honest, wise, contemplative, and introspective. He feels very deeply, and never forgets a slight or a good deed. Not one to hold a grudge, he just simply keeps everyone at a distance until he can be sure they are trustworthy. Extremely perceptive, he often senses others feelings and tries to be considerate of everyone. Every once in a while, he lets his guard down a bit, and when this happens, he can be quite funny. The man was old; very old. He wore small spectacles, and he had a long, white beard that trailed down to just above his belt. Upon further observation, Aramil wondered if this man was even older than his own father. As he contemplated the humorous possibility, the man stood with the help of his cane. Though in my defense, it was a very small target. The man slowly walked down the couple of steps that separated them. Though he was very old, Aramil found that he and the man could easily look one another in the eye. Finally, the man said, "Battles are ugly affairs. Maybe a dozen at most. Why do you wish to join the Guild? Before he could put much thought into it, the man stepped forward again and offered his hand to Aramil saying, "Good, so do I. Welcome to the Guild, Silverleaf.

Paying into a pension 11 Mar I got married young, far too young, but it is fine. We are still married 48 years later. I got married at When did your books become commercially viable? Not that long ago, really. I started writing in , just on the cusp of Certainly for 25 years they provided a little income, growing all the time but very slowly. I remember my accountant saying he found it difficult to justify putting in expenses against my writing income, because I had so little of it. I taught regularly in primary schools for eight or nine years, mainly 10 to 11 year-olds. How did War Horse become so successful? War Horse was my sixth book, published in , and it did not sell very well. For years after, it sold about 2, copies a year. That was the maximum, and my publishers, bless their hearts, kept it in print, along with all my books. The book was discovered 21 years later, by accident. One of the listeners was the mother of the artistic director at the National Theatre, Tom Morris, and after reading War Horse herself she told her son to read it. He was looking for a story with an animal at its heart because he wanted to work with hand string puppets and bring them to the National Theatre. So it was pure luck. Two years later the play comes out, and it is a huge hit that goes to the West End, Broadway and now Canada and Australia, then a nationwide American tour in June this year. In Kathy Kennedy, the producer who works with Steven Spielberg, walks into the New London Theatre to see the play because her daughter was mad on horses. She then phoned Spielberg and told him this would be his next film! He came to London within two weeks and was bowled over by the play. The way it all happened is better than any of my stories. War Horse has now sold well over 1 million copies. Has War Horse changed your life? It has made all the difference in the world. The most important gift it has given us is not to have to worry about money, because there has always been a slight anxiety. There is a downside to it as well, which is an assumption that you are super rich. You are not, actually. It is very nice and completely unexpected but you have got to go on writing. If you are not careful you can alienate yourself from others. I do think there is great danger in the corruption of money because it divides people. I am really pleased this has happened to me coming up to When I was younger I think it would have gone to my head. Now I am too old for anything to go to my head. It is not the same as winning the Lottery. Are you a saver or a spender? My wife is a saver and I am a spender. If I walk into a supermarket I like shopping spontaneously whereas my wife never buys more than she needs. She is right but I have a different temperament. I have bought things on impulse countless times, like changing my cars too often when I was younger. We got burgled a few years later and they pinched my suit but discarded the fancy waistcoat! Do you bank online? My wife does all of that, not me. She banks online and finds it annoying. She manages the business side of my career and only tells me what I need to know. I just get on with writing stories. When did you have the vision of Farms for City Children? Again it was Clare. She used to come down to Devon on holiday as a child and stay in the village where we now live, Iddesleigh. In time she would get to know people and became a country girl. As an adult and a teacher she thought every child should know this kind of rich experience. So in we decided we would use the legacy that her father, Allen Lane, had left her, to set up Farms for City Children. We bought a house and some land in north Devon near Okehampton where the children could come and stay. We knew that the work they would do and their experience would be life changing. The other day this great bear of a man in his thirties came up to me in Oxford. Running a charity is like running a business. That is what we have discovered. At first we thought it was really just about the spirit of the project and making a positive experience for the children. But in order for that to happen you have to find resources to invest in the charity. We now have wonderful young people running it, but for 25 years Clare had to go fund-raising like crazy. Then there is the complexity of employing people. All this we had to learn as we were going along. What is your most treasured possession? My favourite possession is a long multicoloured scarf that took my wife a year to knit.
