Due to her incredible good looks, Ashley Massaro was one of the top Divas in the company during her stay, and has one of the best spreads in Playboy history. It showed in her steaming hot pictorial in the July edition of Raw Magazine in Another outsider magazine photographing a WWE Diva with ropes! Her appearance on the show helped score her this cover of Stuff Magazine, her second with the publication. But Sable can of course. Her issue in April of proved to be such a big hit, that Hugh Hefner had the blonde bombshell back just five months later in the September issue. Sadly by the time this issue came out, Sable was out of the WWE. Over two years absent from professional wrestling, major magazines still wanted a piece of the blonde beauty, as she and those and-a-half-inch legs of hers scored the cover of Maxim Magazine in late And yes, the spread inside is even hotter. Seriously, take a look at the cover Wait, you even still reading this? Torrie Wilson appears on the list yet again and she will one more time. Two out of five make this list, and Terri Runnels is the first. The difference between Ivory and the rest of the Divas during her stay with the company, is that she came in as a wrestler, more focused on putting on a good match than showing off that perfect body of hers. But when she had to, she literally blew all the other Divas out of the water! Two covers in one month? And the reason this one makes the list out of all her other MuscleMag covers? With her trademark high rising thong, she led the way for future covers to come. And after staring at both covers for way too long, the number two slot on this list is a tie. Can you really blame us? This may have been the only time in your life when double dipping was acceptable. Not only is the spread inside a feast for the eyes, the cover alone could top any Playboy list if you ask our opinion.

McMahon, who was a successful boxing promoter, began working with Tex Rickard in . With the help of Rickard, he began promoting boxing and wrestling at the third Madison Square Garden. It was not the first time McMahon had promoted wrestling cards , as he had already done so during the s. He lost the championship to Bruno Sammartino a month later on May 17, , after suffering a heart attack a week before the match. Capitol operated the WWF in a conservative manner compared to other pro wrestling territories: The younger McMahon bought Capitol from his father in , effectively seizing control of the company. Seeking to make the WWF the premier wrestling promotion in the country, and eventually, the world, he began an expansion process that fundamentally changed the wrestling business. This angered other promoters and disrupted the well-established boundaries of the different wrestling promotions, eventually ending the territory system, which was in use since the founding of the NWA in the s. In addition, the company used income generated by advertising, television deals, and tape sales to secure talent from rival promoters. In an interview with Sports Illustrated , McMahon noted: In the old days, there were wrestling fiefdoms all over the country, each with its own little lord in charge. Each little lord respected the rights of his neighboring little lord. No takeovers or raids were allowed. There were maybe 30 of these tiny kingdoms in the U. I, of course, had no allegiance to those little lords. The WWF would tour nationally in a venture that would require a huge capital investment, one that placed the WWF on the verge of financial collapse. WrestleMania was a major success, and was and still is marketed as the Super Bowl of professional wrestling. The concept of a wrestling supercard was nothing new in North America; the NWA had begun running Starrcade a few years prior. He invited celebrities such as Mr. The s "Wrestling Boom" peaked with the WrestleMania III pay-per-view at the Pontiac Silverdome in , which set an attendance record of 93,, a record that stood for 29 years until WrestleMania . NBC walked out on the venture after only one season, but McMahon intended to continue alone. With this purchase, WWF now became by far the largest wrestling promotion in the world. Although mainly caused by an unfavorable ruling in its dispute with the World Wildlife Fund regarding the "WWF" initialism, the company noted it provided an opportunity to emphasize its focus on entertainment. WWE noted that their new company model was put into effect with the relaunch of Tough Enough , being a non-scripted program contrary to the scripted nature of professional wrestling and with the launch of the WWE Network at the time scheduled to launch in ; later pushed back to . However, the legal name of the company remains as World Wrestling Entertainment, Inc. This was dubbed as the " brand extension ". countless benefits to which they would otherwise be entitled". In , wrestlers were subjected to independent testing for anabolic steroids for the first time. Ten professional wrestlers were suspended for violating the Wellness Policy after reports emerged they were all customers of Signature Pharmacy in Orlando, Florida. According to a statement attributed to WWE attorney Jerry McDevitt, an eleventh wrestler was later added to the suspension list. Hassan Assad was diagnosed with Wolffâ€™ Parkinsonâ€™ White syndrome , [86] which can be potentially fatal if gone undiagnosed. The ailment was discovered while Assad was going through a routine Wellness Policy checkup. On September 13, , WWE updated their list of banned substances to include muscle relaxers. Nailz testified that McMahon had ordered him to use steroids, but his credibility was called into question during his testimony as he repeatedly stated that he "hated" McMahon. The jury would later acquit McMahon of the charges and he resumed his role in the day-to day operations of the WWF. This led to a series of lawsuits filed by both companies as the Monday Night War heated up. The lawsuit went on for years, ending with a settlement in . The suit alleged that Wittenstein violated a non-disclosure agreement and shared confidential information with the WWE which represented a comparative advantage in negotiating with wrestling talent under contract with TNA. WWF broke kayfabe by having television commentator Jim Ross repeatedly tell those watching live on pay-per-view that what had just transpired was not a wrestling angle or storyline and that Hart was hurt badly, emphasizing the seriousness of the situation. The cause of death was later revealed to be internal bleeding from blunt force trauma. The WWF management controversially chose to continue the event. Under the agreement, Titan had agreed to cease using the written acronym "WWF" in connection with its wrestling promotion, and to minimize though not eliminate spoken uses of "WWF" on its broadcasts, particularly in scripted comments. Furthermore, the company could still make use of the full "World Wrestling Federation" and "World Wrestling Federation Entertainment" names without consequence. Here Comes The Pain. The case was resolved on both sides with a settlement that saw WWE purchase the catalogue outright in January . The court ruled that Warrior was legally entitled to use the gimmick, costuming, face paint designs, and mannerisms of the "Warrior" character.
